THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

THE SHERIFF CONVERTED.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Acts 16: 30: "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"

IN CARCERATED in a Philippian penitentiary, a place cold, and dark, and damp, and loathsome, and hideous, unilluminated save by the torch of the official who comes to see if they are alive yet, are two ministers of Christ, their feet fast in instruments of torture, their shoulders dripping from the stroke of leathern thongs, their mouths hot with inflammation of thirst, their heads faint because they may not lie down. In a comfortable room of that same building, and amid pleasant surroundings, is a paid officer of the government whose business it is to supervise the prison. It is night and all is still in the corridors of the dungeon save as some murderer struggles with a horrid dream, or a ruffian turns over in his chains, or there is the cough of a dying consumptive amid the dampness; but suddenly, crash! go the walls. The two clergymen pass out free. The jail-keeper, although familiar with the darkness and the horrors hovering around the dungeon, is startled beyond all bounds, and flambeau in hand he rushes through amid the falling walls, shouting at the top of his voice: "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"

I stand now among those who are asking the same question with more or less earnestness, and I accost you in this crisis of your soul with a message from heaven. There are those in this audience who might be more skilful in argument than I am; there are those here who can dive into deeper depths of science, or have larger knowledge; there are in this audience those before whom I would willingly bow as the inferior to the superior; but I yield to no one in this assemblage in a desire to have all the people saved by the power of an omnipotent Gospel.

I shall proceed to characterize the question of the agitated jail-keeper. And first, I characterize the question as courteous. He might have rushed in and said: "Paul and Silas, you vagabonds, are you tearing down this prison? Aren't you satisfied with disturbing the peace of the city by your infamous doctrines? And are you now going to destroy public property? Back with you to your places, you vagabonds!" He said no such thing. The word of four letters, "Sirs!" equivalent to "lords," recognized the majesty and the honor of their mission. Sirs! If a man with a capacious spirit tries to find the way to heaven, he will miss it. If a man comes out and pronounces all Christians as hypocrites and the religion of Jesus Christ as a fraud, and asks irritating questions about the mysterious and the inscrutable, saying, "Come, my wise man, explain this and explain that; if this be true how can that be true?"—no such man finds the way to heaven. The question of the text was decent, courteous, gentlemanly, deferential. Sirs!

Again, I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper by saying that it was a practical question. He did not ask why God let sin come into the world, he did not ask how Christ could be God and man in the same person, he did not ask the doctrine of the decrees explained or want to know whom Cain married, or what was the cause of the earthquake. His present and everlasting welfare was involved in the question, and was not that practical? But I know multitudes of people who are bothering themselves about the non-essentials of religion. What would you think of a man who should, while discussing the question of the light and heat of the sun, spend his time down in a coal cellar, when he might come out and see the one and feel the other? Yet there are multitudes of men who, in discussing the chemistry of the Gospel, spend their time down in the dungeon of their unbelief, when God all the while stands telling them to come out into the noonday light and warmth of the Sun of righteousness. The question for you, my brother, to discuss is not whether Calvin or Arminius was right, not whether a handful of water in holy baptism or a baptistery is the better, not whether foreordination and free agency can be harmonized. The practical question for you to discuss, and for me to discuss, is, "Where will I spend eternity?"

Again, I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper as one personal to himself. I have no doubt he had many friends, and he was interested in their welfare. I have no doubt he found that there were persons in that prison who, if the earthquake had destroyed them, would have found their case desperate. He is not questioning about them. The whole weight of his question turns on the pronoun "I." "What shall I do?" Of course, when a man becomes a Christian, he immediately becomes anxious for the salvation of other people, but until that point is reached the most important question is about your own salvation. "What is to be my destiny?" "What are my prospects for the future?" "Where am I going?" "What shall I do?" The trouble is we shuffle the responsibility off upon others. We prophesy a bad end to that inebriate, and terrific exposure to that defaulter, and awful catastrophe to that profligate. We are so busy in weighing other people we forget ourselves to get into the scales. We are so busy watching the poor gardens of other people that we let our own dooryard go to weeds. We are so busy sending off other people into the lifeboat we sink in the wave. We cry "fire!" because our neighbor's house is burning down and seem to be uninterested although our own house is in the conflagration. O wandering thoughts, disappear to-day. Blot out this entire audience except yourself. Your sin, is it pardoned? Your death, is it provided for? Your heaven, is it secured? A mightier earthquake than that which demolished the Philippian penitentiary will rumble about your ears. The foundations of the earth will give way. The earth by one tremor will fling all the American cities into the dust. Cathedrals and palaces and prisons which have stood for thousands of years will topple like a child's blockhouse. The surges of the sea will submerge the land; and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans above the Alps and the Andes, clap their hands. What then will become of me? What then will become of you? I do not wonder at the anxiety of this man of my text, for he was not only anxious about the falling of the prison, but the falling of a world.

Again, I remark: I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper as one of incomparable importance. Men are alike, and I suppose he had scores of questions on his mind, but all questions for this world are hushed up, forgotten, annihilated in this one question of the text: "What must I do to be saved?" And have you, my brother, any question of importance compared with that question? Is it a question of business? Your common-sense tells you that you will soon cease worldly business. You know very well that you will soon pass out of that partnership. You know that beyond a certain point, of all the millions of dollars' worth of goods sold, you will not handle a yard of cloth, or a pound of sugar, or a penny's worth. After that, if a conflagration should sweep all Washington into ashes, it would not touch you, and would not damage you. If every cashier should abscond and every bank suspend payment, and every insurance company fail, it would not affect you. Oh, how insignificant is business this side the grave with business on the other side the grave!

Oh, what a question, what an important question. Is there any question that compares with it in importance? What is it now to Napoleon III. whether he triumphed or surrendered at Sedan, whether he died at the Tuileries or Chiselhurst, whether he was emperor or exile? Because he was laid out in the coffin in the dress of a field marshal, did that give him any better chance for the future than if he had been laid out in a plain shroud? What difference will it soon make to you or to me whether in this world we walked or rode, whether we were bowed to or maltreated, whether we were applauded or hissed at, welcomed in or kicked out? While laying hold of every moment of the future, and burning in every splendor or every grief, and overarching or undergirding all time and all eternity will be the plain, startling, infinite, stupendous question of the text: "What must I do to be saved?"

Again, I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper as one crushed out by his misfortunes, pressed out by his misfortunes. The falling of the penitentiary, his occupation was gone. Besides that the flight of a prisoner was ordinarily the death of the jailer. He was held responsible. If all had gone well, if the prison walls had not been shaken of the earthquake, if the prisoners had all stayed quiet in the stocks, if the morning sunlight had calmly dropped on the jailer's pillow, do you think he would have hurled this red-hot question from his soul into the ear of his apostolic prisoners? Ah! no; you know as well as I do it was the earthquake that roused him up. And it is trouble that starts a great many people to asking the same question. It has been so with a multitude of you. Your apparel is not as bright as it once was. Why have you changed the garb? Do you not like solferino, and crimson, and purple as well as once? Yes. But you say: "While I was prospered and happy those colors were accordant with my feelings; now they would be discord to my soul." And so you have plaited up the shadows into your apparel. The world is a very different place from what it was once for you! Once you said: "Oh, if I could only have it quiet a little while." It is too quiet. Some people say that they would not bring back their departed friends from heaven even if they had the opportunity; but if you had the opportunity you would bring back your loved ones and soon their feet would be sounding in the hall, and soon their voices would be heard in the family, and the old times would come back just as the festal days of Christmas and Thanksgiving—days gone forever. Oh, it is the earthquake that startled you to asking this question—the earthquake of domestic misfortune. Death is so cruel, so devouring, so relentless, that when it swallows up our loved ones we must have some one to whom we can carry our torn and bleeding hearts. We need a balsam better than anything that ever exuded from earthly tree to heal the pang of the soul. It is pleasant to have our friends gather around us and tell us how sorry they are, and try to break up the loneliness; but nothing but the hand of Jesus Christ can take the bruised soul and put it in his bosom, hushing it with the lullaby of heaven. O brother! O sister! the gravestone will never be lifted from your heart until Christ lifts it. Was it not the loss of your friends, or the persecution of your enemies, or the overthrow of your worldly estate—was it not an earthquake that started you out to ask this stupendous question of my text?

But I remark again: I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper as hasty, urgent, and immediate. He put it on the run. By the light of his torch as he goes to look for the apostles, behold his face, see the startled look and see the earnestness. No one can doubt by that look that the man is in earnest. He must have that question answered before the earth stops rocking, or perhaps he will never have it answered at all. Is that the way, my brother, my sister, you are putting this question? Is it on the run? Is it hasty? Is it urgent? Is it immediate? If it is not, it will not be answered. That is the only kind of question that is answered. It is the urgent and the immediate question of the Gospel Christ answers. A great many are asking this question, but they draw it out, and there is indifference in their manner as if they do not mean it. Make it an urgent question and then you will have it answered before an hour passes, before a minute passes. When a man with all the earnestness of his soul cries out for God, he finds him, and finds him right away.

Oh, are there not in this house to-day those who are postponing until the last hour of living the attending to the things of the soul? I give it as my opinion that ninety-nine out of the one hundred death-bed repentances amount to nothing. Of all the scores of persons mentioned as dying in the Bible, of how many do you read that they successfully repented in the last hour? Of fifty? No. Of forty? No. Of thirty? No. Of twenty? No. Of ten? No. Of five? No. Of one—only one, barely one, as if to demonstrate the fact that there is a bare possibility of repenting in the last hour. But that is improbable, awfully improbable, terrifically improbable. One hundred to one against the man. If, my brother, my sister, you have ever seen a man try to repent in the last hour, you have seen something very sad. I do not know anything on earth so sad as to see a man try to repent on a deathbed. There is not from the moment that life begins to breathe in infancy, to the last gasp, such an unfavorable, completely unfavorable, hour for repentance as the death hour, the last hour. There are the doctors standing with the medicines. There is the lawyer standing with the half-written will. There is the family in consternation as to what is to become of them. All the bells of eternity ringing the soul out of the body. All the past rising before us and all the future. Oh, that man is a fool who procrastinates to the death-bed his repentance!

After my friend in Philadelphia died, his children gave his church Bible to me, and I read it, looked over it with much interest. I saw in the margin, written in lead pencil: "Mr. Talmage said this morning that the most useless thing in all God's universe is that any sinner should perish." I did not remember saying it, but it is true, and I say it now, whether said it then or not: the most useless thing in all God's universe is that any sinner should perish. Twelve gates. Have you not heard how Christ's sorrows, and how sympathetic all our woes! Have that with all the agonies of "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do?" By his feet blistered of the mountain way—by his back whipped until the skin came off, by his death-couch of four spikes, two for the hands and two for the feet—by his sepulchre, in which for the first time for thirty-three years the cruel world let him alone—and by the heavens from which he now bends in compassion, offering pardon and peace, and life eternal to all your souls, I beg of you put down your all at his feet.

I saw one hanging on a tree
In agony and blood,
Who fixed his languid eyes on me
As near his cross I stood.

Oh, never till my latest breath,
Will I forget that look;
It seemed to charge me with his death,
Though not a word he spoke.

In the troubled times of Scotland, Sir John Cochrane was condemned to death by the king. The death-warrant was on the way. Sir John Cochrane was bidding farewell to his daughter Grizel at the prison door. He said: "Farewell, my darling child! I must die." His daughter said: "No, father, you shall not die." "But," he said, "the king is against me, and the law is after me, and the death-warrant is on its way, and I must die; do not deceive yourself, my dear child." The daughter said: "Father, you shall not die," as she left the prison gate. At night, on the moors of Scotland, a disguised wayfarer stood waiting for the horseman carrying the mail-bags containing the death-warrant. The disguised wayfarer, as the horse came by, clutched the bridle and shouted to the rider—to the man who carried the mail-bags: "Dismount?" He felt for his arms, and was about to shoot, but the wayfarer jerked him from his saddle and he fell flat. The wayfarer picked up the mail-bags, put them on his shoulder and vanished in the darkness, and fourteen days were thus gained for the prisoner's life, during which the father confessor was pleading for the pardon of Sir John Cochrane; and before those fourteen days had expired, pardon had come from the king. The door of the prison swung open, and Sir John Cochrane was free. One day when he was standing amid his friends, they congratulating him, the disguised wayfarer appeared at the gate, and he said, "Admit him right away." The disguised wayfarer came in and said: "Here are two letters; read them, sir, and cast them into the fire." Sir John Cochrane read them. They were his two death-warrants, and he threw them into the fire. Then said Sir John Cochrane: "To whom am I indebted? Who is this poor wayfarer that saved my life? Who is it?" And the wayfarer pulled aside and pulled off the jerkin and the cloak, and the hat, and lo! it was Grizel, the daughter of Sir John Cochrane. "Gracious Heaven!" he cried, "my child, my saviour, my own Grizel!" But a more thrilling story. The death-warrant had come forth from the King of heaven and earth. The death-warrant read: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." The death-warrant coming on the black horse of eternal night. We must die! We must die! But breasting the storm and putting out through the darkness was a disguised wayfarer who gripped by the bridle the on-coming doom and flung it back, and put his wounded and bleeding foot on the overthrown rider. Meanwhile pardon flashed from the throne, and, Go free! Open the gate! Strike off the chain! Go free! And to-day your liberated soul stands in the presence of the disguised wayfarer, and as he pulls of the disguise of his earthly humiliation and the disguise of his thorns, and the disguise of the seamless robe, you find he is bone of your bone, flesh of your flesh, your Brother, your Christ, your Pardon, your Eternal Life. Let all earth and heaven break forth in vociferation! Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!

A guilty, weak, and helpless worm,
On thy kind arm I lean;
Be Thou my strength and my righteousness,
My Jesus and my God!

A MODERN PENIEL.

The Full Prayer Meeting in New York, where for Thirty-eight Years Christians from Every State Have Met Daily to Plead with God.

EVERY business day the year through, about noon, a number of people may be seen entering a building in Fulton street, New York. Merchants, bankers, lawyers, stock-brokers are often among the throng. Fulton street at that hour is a busy place, a steady stream of people going west, and another going east, with earnest, intent faces, evidently occupied with business concerns. In these days of severe competition, business in New York is no child's-play. It calls all the faculties into exercise, and the strain of the life is seen in the manner of these men, in their alert attitude, the quick step, and the absorption of their countenances. But though at the noon hour business is at its height, and within a stone's throw millions of dollars are changing hands, the men who are entering the building are not going to a business meeting. Enter with them and you find yourself in a spacious room, plainly furnished with a number of benches, a reading desk, and a small organ. Promptly as the clock strikes the hour of noon, the leader of the meeting—sometimes a neighboring minister, or a visitor from some distant city, or a business man of New York—rises and utters a few words of prayer. Then a short passage of Scripture is read and a hymn sung.

There is a pile of letters on the table which have been read and the contents summarized by Mr. C. F. Cutter, the permanent president of the meeting. From his summary which he reads, we learn that a widow, in Vermont is distressed about the condition of a wayward son; that a family in Kansas are in trouble, the mortgage on their farm having been foreclosed; that a wife in Chicago is anxious about her husband who left her a week or two ago and has not returned; that a husband in Cleveland is fearful that his wife will die of a critical illness; that the pastor of some cold indifferent church is longing for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and soon through a list which shows how many and varied are the afflictions and anxieties of human life. As the list, which represents some one to two hundred letters that have come by mail, is exhausted, one person after another rises in the meeting and presents personally some urgent case of trouble, or worry.

MR. J. C. LANPHIER.

(Founder of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting.)

Then the leader invites short prayers. They are limited to five minutes, and sometimes they are shorter than that. At a quarter of one the leader rises and asks any one present who may wish to give a word of testimony to speak, and then there are acknowledgements of answers to prayer and reports of blessing received. A final hymn and the benediction close the meeting precisely at one o'clock, and the people disperse to the stores and offices of the neighborhood. This is the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, the fame of which has gone out to every land in Christendom.

The meeting was commenced in 1857. The first meeting was held September 23. This was a year of business anxiety and distress. It was a year, too, of religious revival and aggressive spiritual work. The

THE FIRST FULTON STREET PRAYER MEETING.

Old North Dutch Church in Fulton street was putting in operation several methods of reaching outsiders, and among others that of employing a missionary to go from house to house visiting the sick and the discouraged. The church had selected for this duty Mr. J. C. Lanphier, an earnest Christian business-man, who loved such work and had for years been devoting to it all the time his business duties left unoccupied. He was glad to quit business and give all his time to it, though in doing so he must resign a lucrative position and bright prospects. The church could not have made a wiser selection. Mr. Lanphier devoted himself heart and soul to the work and proved a blessing to all that section of the city. It became his habit to turn into the Consistory Room of the church every day and there "shut to the door and commune with his Father who is in secret," and gain fresh spiritual strength for his duties. They were delightful interludes in which he came very near to God and enjoyed sweet peace and rest. It occurred to him that there must be many, in that time of anxious concern, who would benefit by such seasons of prayer. He spoke of it to a few friends who agreed with him. The consent of the consistory to hold the meeting in their room was obtained and notices of the first meeting were issued. A picture of the room as it appeared on that day is published on this page. Mr. Lanphier was punctual at his post, but for nearly half-an-hour no one joined him. He remained, however, and presently one person came and afterwards four others. At the next meeting there were twenty present. A daily meeting was not contemplated at that time. It was thought that once a week would be as often as it would be possible to gather a company together. The meetings were held every Wednesday, but at the fourth, when there was a large attendance, one of the persons present spoke of the benefit he had derived from the meeting and urged that it be held daily. His proposal was put to the vote and carried unanimously. From that time to the present, a period of thirty-eight years, there has been no interruption. Regularly at noon on every business day, the voice of prayer and praise has gone up from the company of believers at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting. It was necessary as the numbers grew, to transfer the meeting from the consistory room to the large hall on the lower floor, and when the church was pulled down to make room for the growing needs of that part of the city, the old hall, hallowed by so many prayers, was not disturbed.

Until September, 1893, the meeting continued under the charge of its founder, Mr. J. C. Lanphier. To his tact, uniform courtesy, and large, broad-minded brotherliness much of its success was due, but he was then eighty-four years of age and he felt it necessary to transfer the duty to younger hands. On the thirty-sixth anniversary of the first meeting, he formally and solemnly committed the charge to Mr. C. F. Cutter, who had consented to become his successor. In a voice broken with emotion, he bade farewell to the meeting and solemnly commended his successor to the kindness and consideration of the friends of the Meeting and fervently implored the blessing of God upon him. "Dear Old Fulton Street," said the white-haired veteran, looking around the walls and raising his hands as if in affectionate embrace, "How I love you! Good-by! Good-by!" It was stated at that meeting by Mr.

Homer, who had been examining the records, which Mr. Lanphier had carefully kept, that in the course of its history there had been 11,232 meetings. The number of prayers offered had exceeded 56,000, and the number of requests for prayer received by mail from all the States and from beyond the sea, besides those verbally presented, was over 235,000. More than half-a-million persons had attended the meetings. During the war, and in times of national crisis, the attendance had been very large, and during the anxious weeks when President Garfield lay sick, the room was crowded day after day. The records, like the large number of requests for prayer sent every week to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for presentation at the Converts' Meeting of the Bowery Mission, are a significant evidence of the unshaken confidence of the people in the power and efficacy of prayer.

A deeply interesting feature of these records is the list Mr. Lanphier made during the thirty-six years that he conducted the meeting, of the requests he received for thanks to be offered for the answers to prayer. Although, doubtless, many prayers were answered, of which no acknowledgment was publicly made, the number of persons who, like the one leper among the ten whom Christ healed, did return to offer thanks, is sufficient to show by what wonderful ways God does answer prayer. In one case a missionary submitted the case of a man who was being sued for money which he had held as trustee and had honestly expended, but could not recollect how he had expended it. Prayer was offered for him, and when the next day the case was tried, evidence was given by a person who happened to be in court, totally unknown to the accused man, which completely vindicated him. Another case was that of an immigrant girl in sore need, and vainly seeking employment, whose case was sent to the meeting. That day, the girl, too poor to purchase a newspaper, picked up a torn leaf in the street, and looking it over in the faint hope that some one might have advertised a vacant position that she could fill, saw a personal advertisement from relatives across the Atlantic, informing her that abundant means had been placed at her disposal. Of acknowledgments of prayers answered for money to be supplied in time to meet emergencies, there are an immense number. For recovery from sickness there have been many prayers offered which have been marvelously answered. But the largest number are for the conversion of relatives and friends. One, which Mr. Lanphier often quoted, was the prayer of a widow for the conversion of her two sons, grown to maturity in sinful life. They lived twelve miles apart and did not know that prayer was being offered for them, yet within twenty-four hours both of them were earnestly seeking Christ. The pages of these volumes of letters are full of proofs that God is the rewarder of those who diligently seek him.

The Boy Jesus.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 12., Luke 2 : 40-52. Golden Text Luke 2 : 52. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AFTER the presentation of the infant Jesus in the temple, where the Lord's two "remembrancers," the aged Simeon and Anna, had recognized and accepted with joy and thankfulness their new-born Messiah, all we are told of him is, "The Child grew and waxed strong [in spirit], filled with wisdom; and the grace of God was upon him." "The Word became flesh, and dwelt [or tabernacled] among us." (John 1: 14, R. V.) He "emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men." (Phil. 2: 7, R. V.) The Apostle Paul, in another epistle, says that God sent his Son "in the likeness of sinful flesh." (Rom. 8: 3.) Again in the Epistle to the Hebrews we read, not only that he was "made a little lower than the angels," but also that "as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same;" for "in all things it behooved him to be made

Like Unto His Brethren

(Heb. 2: 9, 14, 17). And yet, while still on earth, he could speak of himself as "the Son of God which is in heaven" (John 3: 13), and say, "I and my Father are one" (John 10: 30), he did not cease to be God, the Eternal Son. When the well-known Emperor of Russia, Peter the Great, found how inefficient was the navy of his country, he conceived and carried out the noble design of learning ship-building in the London dock-yards as a common ordinary mechanic. For this purpose he emptied himself, for the time, of all his royal glory, and labored incognito with English mechanics, at the same work, using the same tools, working the same number of hours, until he had accomplished his purpose, when he returned to Russia and resumed his authority and glory as emperor. While he was a workman his royal estate did nothing for him, and yet he did not for a moment cease to be emperor, and no one could take his place; yet his power as emperor was not that which wielded the hammer, worked the saw, drove the nails, or planed the wood. All this he did as a workman and not as an emperor.

There are many grown up people as well as children who imagine that it was no trouble or difficulty for Jesus to learn, and to become filled with wisdom; he was God, he had no lessons to master. As well might it have been said of Peter the Great that it was no trouble to him to work the long hours which working men then labored; that because he was an emperor it was easy to him! No; it behooved the Lord Jesus from his infancy to be made "in all things like unto his brethren;" like other men, like other children. The knowledge he gained as man he gained by patient, persevering study, just as any other schoolboy. "And the grace of God was upon him;" he needed grace for his earthly life, to meet temptation, to enable him willingly to obey, etc., just as every other child does. Just as Peter the Great with the other workmen as fully as though he had not been an emperor, so the Lord Jesus, in his earthly life, put himself on the level of all the sons of men, needing the grace of God, the power of the Holy Spirit, the indwelling of God, as we do. "The Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works." (John 14: 10). At twelve years of age, when he would enter upon the year of his majority, Jesus was taken up to Jerusalem by his parents, whose custom it was, as pious Jews, to be present at the feast every year. On such an occasion, probably the people who came up to the feast would camp out, as Eastern people do now, when they hold a great religious festival. In such warm climates it is perfectly easy, and much more agreeable to sleep out of doors. Thus, when the days were fulfilled, and Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem, it was easy for his friends, if they were preoccupied, not to miss him as they would have done if they had lodged in one or two rooms. Then the journeys were undertaken as journeys in the East are now. From all the towns and villages contingents would come, meeting in the main road which led up to Jerusalem, and so some hundreds of friends, neighbors and fellow-citizens would arrive together. I have seen some fifty Indian gharries arrive at an idol feast in one long cavalcade. On the returning journey, too, those who took the same road would start listened in astonishment, this young, and with no mark of outward superiority of position, should give expression to such thoughts.

Thus occupied, his mother and Joseph came suddenly upon him and were surprised, and his mother said, "Son, why hast thou dealt thus with us? Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing." The reply was characteristic: "How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be in that which is of my Father?" (free trans.) As though to say, "Joseph is not my Father, but while you and he were too occupied with your own things to miss me, I have been, as I am at Nazareth every available moment occupied with what concerns my real Father, God. They might have noticed how, at Nazareth, no interest with him came near that of Scripture study, but "they understood not the saying which he spake to them, but his mother kept all these sayings in her heart;" she knew from the message of the angel Gabriel who this wondrous Child was.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

ONE glimpse of the childhood of Jesus is given us in the lesson, the only one we have of him between infancy and maturity. For some reason, possibly with a prevision of the disputes that were in later years to arise about the person of Jesus, the Evangelist records, and a little further on, reiterates, the fact of growth and development in him. He evidently wishes it clearly understood that Jesus was not an together, dropping off at the branch roads those whose paths diverged.

In the excitement of family news, the state of the crops, or the political questions which the visit to the city would stir up, there was much that would make it an easy matter to be unaware of the absence of one lad. But Mary, at last, knew who it was that was missing, and without doubt her heart smote her, that she had allowed herself to be so absorbed as to be oblivious of his absence. They turned back to Jerusalem, for Jesus was not to be found in the traveling company. They had last seen him in the temple, and yet that was the last place in which they looked for him. It was the custom of the members of the Sanhedrim to come out upon Sabbath days and feast days, to teach and expound the Scriptures on the terrace of the temple. It was usual for perfect liberty to be given to such as would discuss, ask questions, or raise objections. This was the point of attraction for Jesus. No interest was so great to him as that which circled round the Word of God. It was the occasion of the Passover. The young Student of Scripture had probably as man, enlightened by the Holy Spirit, discovered how his birth at Bethlehem, his pedigree from David, his going down to Egypt, etc., etc., had been foretold in the Scriptures, and it may be that this feast of the Passover had stirred up yet more within him the consciousness of his vocation. As he heard the Rabbis teaching, he would put to them questions of such an intensely real and startling nature, that the learned men angel, or a spirit, but a man with a human nature like our own. Nor was this only as to his body. Luke says he increased in wisdom, showing that there was mental as well as physical growth. He was subject to Joseph and his mother, and doubtless acquired his learning from them and from the teachers in the school attached to the Synagogue of Nazareth. As Dr. Trumbull has shown, there were schools for Bible study throughout Palestine and it is little likely that Mary, with her knowledge of his wonderful origin would have allowed her son to miss this training. The visit to Jerusalem with which the lesson is concerned, was the ordinary annual visit which Joseph was required to make at the Passover as prescribed by law. Jesus, then twelve years old, was entitled to enrollment as a disciple of the law and went with him for the first time, to undergo the ceremony. Mary's presence was not necessary, but probably maternal solicitude accounts for her journey. That after all, she should have lost sight of her precious charge is the more remarkable. She does not appear to have been worried about his absence at first, concluding that he must be with friends somewhere among the crowd, which at that time would be leaving Jerusalem for the northern districts. Mary's equanimity incidentally shows that his conduct was such as to give his mother no anxiety. But at the close of the first day's march, probably not more than eight miles, when the whole procession would halt at the khan or the camping-place for the night, the mother's heart became troubled, as one party after another came in, and the boy was not with them. Then she and Joseph retrace their steps and seek Jesus in Jerusalem. The search must have been a time of sorrow and dreadful foreboding. But Mary's reproach when they find him is very tender. The reply Jesus gave her was one of surprise. It was an intimation that would startle Mary, that in some way he knew of his divine origin. She had said, "thy father and I." He speaks of the Temple as his Father's house. Why had they sought him? Did they not think he must be in his Father's house? He had simply availed himself of the opportunity of the visit to the capital to attend the school that the chief Rabbis held daily on the terrace of the temple. His inquiring mind had been eliciting from them their views of the sacred books. That was the system adopted in the schools of the time. The Rabbi would read a passage and the boys would ask him questions. His replies were often in the form of questions, too, compelling them to think and to show their reasons for their questions. Jesus had probably been too much absorbed in his study to notice the passage of time. But his mother's summons recalls him to a recollection of filial duty, and he goes submissively with them and resumes his home-life, setting an example of dutifulness for children of every generation.

Sought him among kinsfolk. A romantic story is told of the parentage of Thomas Beckett, the famous Archbishop. His father fought in the Crusades and was taken prisoner by the Saracens. During his captivity he was beloved and helped by a Turkish girl who, after he escaped, pined for him. She followed him to England and wandered about London seeking him. She knew no English, but with his name on her lips, went from street to street, calling out "Gilbert, Gilbert!" till, at last, the cry reached the right ears. She became the wife of Beckett and the mother of the Archbishop. Like her, many a soul has left home and kindred under the magnetism of a love, better than her's—the love of the Saviour, resolved to follow him at the sacrifice of all besides.

Found him in the Temple. Many have found Christ in the house of God who could not find him elsewhere. That is the right place to look for him and people who stay away from church are very apt not to find him at all. Yet it is important to remember that he is in the home, in the school and in the place of business, and our conduct should be governed by the consciousness of his presence. An eminent clergyman tells the story of an infidel who was very much provoked because some good people had impressed this fact on his little grand-daughter. He thought it would make her serious and dull. So he wrote in large letters on a card, "God is nowhere," and hung it up in her room. It did not have the desired effect, for the child was still more sober and thoughtful. Finally, he asked her about it and found that the child, who was learning to read; had followed her school habit of separating the words into syllables and had read his inscription as "God is now here," which was true but not the meaning he wanted to convey.

How is it that ye sought me? These are the first recorded words of Jesus. They practically told his mother that if she had understood his character, she would not have spent three days searching for him, but would have gone straight to the place where he was most likely to be found. This characteristic of concentration of purpose, the avoidance of distraction from all subjects but the main object of life, has been noticeable in the lives of all men who have accomplished great things. It was recorded of one of the most eminent triumphs of Rome that during his year of office, he was never seen in any street of the city save the one that led from his house to the capitol. Of John Howard, the prison philanthropist, it was said, that though he had visited every European capital he knew less about them than many a man who stayed at home. He had not visited the picture galleries, nor the parks, nor the great buildings, nor places of amusement. One of his friends said that if he heard that Howard was in any city, he would have no difficulty in finding him, however populous it might be. He would go to the worst prison in the city and wait there, certain that Howard would come there. To look for him anywhere else would be to waste time.

A New Year's Change.

MR. HENRY PEMBERTON was a miser. A beggar or a spendthrift would either of them have been a more worthy member of the community, for a beggar opens other people's hearts and excites their sympathies, and a spendthrift sets money in circulation, even if he does it in foolish ways and unfortunate channels. But a miser is of no use at all under God's heaven.

"They say he has ten thousand dollars in the bank," little Harvey Jenner whispered to his brother Benjamin, as the rheumatic old man shuffled past in his rags and dirt, wheezing and puffing, and holding fast to the fence for fear of falling, for the pavement was icy. A sleety rain was coming down, but it was so near New Years that the boys could not think of staying indoors by bright fires. Their blood danced in their veins. What did they care for sleet and cold?

"There goes old Miser Pemberton!" shouted one of the lads, and the rest in a group on the sidewalk near his house took it up, and vociferated loudly and shrilly, Old miser! Horrid old miser!

Got gold in bags full; see how he goes,
Stumbling along on his mean old toes.

This rhyme had been composed by Rex Peabody, and the boys had sung it at the miser many a time under their breath; never till now in his absolute face and hearing. The miser turned, his bleary eyes and wizened old face gleaming with furious passion. He raised his stick to menace his tormentors, when, presto! he lost his balance and slipped to the pavement with a broken leg. All his tormentors took to their heels, afraid of the blue-coated policeman, who in the very nick of time came squarely looming around the corner, but Harvey and Benjamin Jenner did not run. They had taken no part in the jeers and cat-calls, and they were sorry for the poor, old man, who lay groaning and moaning on the pavements, conscious, and angry at having to go to the hospital.

"Take me to my own house," he said, angrily and obstinately.

"But," remonstrated a physician, who had opportunely appeared on the scene, "you will have better care and nursing at the hospital, Mr. Pemberton. There is no one to care for you at your house."

"My daughter will come. Her address is in my wallet. Give it to me. You, Benny Jenner, I can trust you to put your hand in my pocket. You are an honest boy."

The old gentleman had his way, though the doctor shook his head at the sight of the fireless room, the squalor and dirt of Mr. Pemberton's wretched home. Bare as it was, however, it was an ample mansion, needing only the expenditure of a little money to make it habitable. The old man's leg was set. Mrs. Jenner and her husband took charge of affairs, brought in a char-woman to clean, and sent in wood and coal, Mr. Pemberton groaning that he would be ruined, and finally working himself up into a fever, and talking in wild delirium.

"It was a great mistake to bring him home. The hospital was the only place where he could have had comfort," said the doctor to Mr. Jenner. "Did you ever see anything so dreadful as this rich man's living here, with rats and mice scampering through the walls, the wind whistling through cracks and crannies, and rags stuffed in the holes in the panes? I wonder what sort of person his daughter is."

Just then the door bell rang. It woke strange echoes in that quiet house, ghostly echoes from other days when children had played there, and brides had swept down the broad staircase in their white wedding splendor, and there had been gladness and gayety and kindness and good fellowship under the old roof.

Mr. Jenner opened the door. A tall, slender lady, wrapped from head to foot in a dark cloak of some thick fur, with a woolen material as its outer cover, advanced into the light of the candle in the gentleman's hand.

"I am Nancy Pemberton," she said. "I understand that my father has sent for me. Is it true?"

"If you are Mr. Pemberton's daughter, it is true that he needs you, and asked me to telegraph for you. He is hurt and ill."

The lady stared curiously at the cobwebbed ceilings and dusty rooms, "Poor, poor father!" she murmured; but there were no tears in her eyes, and her face was not tender. She did not at once forget that she had been driven from her father's door with blows and abuse, because she would not surrender to him her mother's small fortune, settled on her, in her own right. She had said in going away fingering a black bruise on her arm:

"I am Nancy Pemberton," she said.

"Father, if you ever need me, send for me, and I will come for my poor mother's sake, but I will not give up to your greed, nor let my spirit break under your harshness, as hers broke before she died."

That scene was six years back. In that time not once had Nancy Pemberton seen or heard from her father, nor had he made the least attempt to hold any communication with her. And he was a very old and feeble man, tottering under the burden of almost four-score years.

"You are his heir," friends had said. "You ought to seek a reconciliation, lest he leave his money away from you."

"I do not want a penny of his money, I fear there would be no blessing on it," was always Nancy's proud answer.

But she came swiftly when she was summoned. Her presence in her father's chamber made an immediate change for the better. In twenty-four hours the whole place was transformed.

The pitiful thing was to hear the ravings of the poor old man, sometimes muttering rapidly, sometimes shrieking, sometimes picking at the bed-clothes, always wretched and distraught.

"He is terribly run down," said the doctor. "Vitality is at a low ebb. Only good nursing, and that by a miracle, can bring him up."

Then, Nancy Pemberton, with womanly compassion, cast away the grudge and the almost bitter hate she had long carried against her father. She sent for a trained nurse to assist her, and together they gave the patient such care as makes a brave battle against death. The revelations of delirium showed Nancy that her father had been remorseful and unhappy. She fell on her knees and prayed with eager insistence that his life might be spared, that he might for a little while taste the joy of conquered self-hood and overcome the barriers that had hemmed him in.

And God listened, and granted her prayer. New Year's morning broke. "Ring out the old, ring in the new, ring out the false, ring in the true," clashed the bells from many a steeple. Henry Pemberton stirred on his pillow, looked about him, with a strange wistful gaze. No wonder he did not know the place. The bed was clean. White curtains draped the windows. A whitely covered table was beside his couch, and an easy chair. A fire burned on the hearth, and there was a shaded lamp.

"Where am I," said the sick man.

"You are at home, father," answered a gentle voice.

"Are you my little Nancy? Will you stay with me?" he pleaded.

"Yes, father, as long as you want me, I will."

"Nancy, I am a miser, I am an old, wicked skinflint of a miser. That's what I am, Nancy!"

"No, father, not if God has opened your eyes. You won't be that any more: Christ will help you to do better."

"Christ will help me to do better," said the old man, like a little child. "And Christ will let you stay. Kiss me, my daughter Nancy, please kiss your old daddy, for—love—has—come—back, love—has—come—back!"

Mr. Pemberton did not live till Spring. But the New Year's change was permanent. It had been a change wrought by hands Divine. "Ring out the false, ring in the true," God says this sometimes, and then the soul obeys, and arises new-clothed, and white as Naaman when his leprosy had departed, after he had bathed in the Jordan. Nancy, too, was happier, for she had learned that there is great peace in having a forgiving spirit.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Hall Converted.

It is announced by the Sydney (Australia) Telegraph that the Lyceum Free-thought Hall in Campbell street, which cost $22,500, and was dedicated "to the destruction of Christianity and Godism in Sydney," has been bought for half the money by the Church of Christ. Strangest of all, one of the speakers at the opening of the hall for Christian work was a former vice-president of the Secularists' Society, and the first person to profess conversion was a gentleman who was formerly secretary of the Free-thought party.

An Octogenarian Pastor.

Rev. John D. Wells' Life-time of Christian Service—A Loving Testimonial.

ONE evening, lately, a large and interested audience gathered in the South Third Street Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, for the purpose of celebrating the eightieth anniversary of the birth of the senior pastor of that church, Rev. John

REV. JOHN D. WELLS, D.D.

D. Wells, D.D. The services were under the auspices of the Young People's Association connected with the church, and were presided over by the President of the Association, Mr. George R. Valentine, who gave expression to the affection of the young people for Dr. Wells. Many of these were children of parents who had come into the communion of the church since their pastor's installation, nearly forty-six years ago.

A most affectionate address in behalf of the Church and congregation, was delivered by Mr. Davis S. Giffing, elder and trustee. Addresses were also made by Rev. George Alexander, Rev. Lewis R. Foote, Rev. John E. Adams, Rev. S. M. Haskins, and several others, and a joint letter from four of the leading Presbyterian Churches in Brooklyn (all of which were, in a sense, the offspring of Dr. Wells' own church and his forty-six years' pastorate there), was presented to the aged servant of the Master.

One of the many pleasant features of this remarkable and spontaneous testimonial to a preacher, was the reading of a poem by Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, dedicated to the octogenarian. Among the verses are these:

Yours is the strong right hand
The eye undimmed and clear, Around you children's children stand,
To hail each happy year.
In all your faithful life,
From ceaseless sun to sun,
Each year, with toils for others rife,
The Lord has sealed, well done!

Dr. Wells replied very feelingly to these numerous and varied expressions of love and good-will. In the course of his address he said:

"I have lately been reading the life of Professor Henry B. Smith, D.D., who in his early manhood spent several years in Germany as a student. Impressed deeply by his intense desire to see his parents and other kindred in the home-land, it came very strongly home to my heart that I might reasonably cherish a strong desire to see my parents and many other kindred, and hundreds of friends, who have fallen asleep in Jesus, and are forever with him in the better country, and to be myself with them in his presence. This, it seems to me, is a normal Christian desire. Therefore, I ask a favor of my people. It may happen that I shall sometimes give expression to this desire from the pulpit. At the same time, and always, I would have it known that 'all the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come.' Please do not think that I am becoming morbid and tired of life. I have much to live for, but there is much beyond, and above, that I wish to know, and share with those who have gone before."

BUSY RELIEF WORK AT VAN.

Miss Kimball's First Report—Good Results Already Achieved—"Half a Million Suffering," Says Dr. Dwight—The Baiburt Massacre.

THE DARDANELLES.

PERCE winter comes, and we must die,
Western brothers, hear our cry!
In your ceiled houses
warm,

Safe shut in from sleet and storm,
Help the houseless. Clothe the feet
That must freeze in storm and sleet.
Brothers! sisters! heed our cry,
Winter comes, we all must die!

Free America! afar,
Show the Kaiser and the Czar
What the heart of God can teach—
How the hand of man can reach!
Send the Red Cross! Murder reigns!
Pestilence walks through our plains!
Send your ships with corn and wheat,
Bid our starving thousands eat.

Such is the appeal of Armenia, as voiced by the sympathetic pen of Mrs. Cyrus Hamlin, the wife of the veteran missionary who, with her by his side, has spent almost a lifetime among the Armenians. It is no exaggeration to say that the condition so touchingly presented in the verses is literally true—indeed, less than the truth; for the winter has already set in, and doubtless hundreds whom help has failed to reach in time, have already perished. The following letter has been received from Dr. Grace N. Kimball at Van—the first in many months to pass the cordon of Turkish officialism:

VAN, TURKEY, Nov. 25, 1895.

DEAR SIR:—Your favor of the 22d ult. was most agreeable reading to us; and I make haste to acknowledge, with cordial thanks, the remittance to our account, through Dr. Dwight, of $500 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. [This was the first remittance to Dr. Kimball.] It comes at a most opportune moment, when, on the one hand, our relief funds were low, and, on the other hand, when we were receiving the advance guard of the army of refugees that is bearing down on the city of Van.

During the first days of the month we were eagerly expecting the arrival of your commissioner, Mr. Howard; but for the past fifteen days, these hopes have been, to say the least, in abeyance. We imagine that he is across the border in Persia,—probably at Khoi, or Tabriz, and undoubtedly a very much disgusted man! The entire country between here and there, as well as the whole of Armenia, is in a state of complete anarchy, and at the mercy of the Kurds. A Christian stirs abroad at the peril of his life. There are 500 Armenian villages in the Province of Van, and more than three-quarters of them have been looted and their inhabitants driven forth naked and homeless to face the winter. The local Government simply says that it has no orders to act. All business in the city of Van, all schools, and all work of all kinds is absolutely suspended, and has been for three weeks. The Armenians are afraid even to go about freely in the town, except in distinctly Armenian quarters.

Under these conditions I am sure you will not censure your Commissioner if he does not succeed in getting here promptly or at all. Personally, we sincerely hope that he will succeed, by his American "push" in accomplishing the seemingly impossible. But as regards the relief work, there is some fear lest his presence should turn the suspicions of the Government toward this work and thus defeat the whole thing. You can easily see that when it is the deliberate policy of the Porte to blot out its Christian subjects, our work, unless done quietly, will be apt to meet with opposition in some indirect, but effective kind. I have had my Industrial Bureau working now for nearly six months, and whatever I may do in a quiet way towards enlarging it and adding other agencies is not so likely to attract attention as to have a stranger come in. I feel that my position in relation to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund is a somewhat delicate one; but common sense and the exigencies of the case, together with the confidence implied in your letter of remittance leads me to act as your self-constituted agent until such time as Mr. Howard arrives, or you send definite orders in the matter. The needs of the people brook no delay, and I believe you would wish the money to be put to immediate use. As you know, perhaps, I am acting as the Executive Agent for the English "Woman's Armenian Relief Fund," with H. B. M.'s Vice-consul, C. M. Hallward, Esq., as Auditor; and until otherwise advised I will administer what funds you put at my disposal in the same way.

Your letter came on Thursday. On the strength of that, on Friday I rented a bakery, put in a corps of men who, but for that work, would have seen their families go hungry, and Saturday morning we were ready to distribute over 500 pounds of excellent bread,—the first of many thousand pounds that I hope THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund will distribute to the famishing people. This is really the only source from which they have any hope of getting food, as the city people are both too poor and too distracted to carry on any public scheme of relief. Would that you and all contributors could see the crowds that have thronged our gates these two days! I enclose a photograph taken on the first day, before the people had really learned to come here for a definite purpose. It really gives no adequate idea of how ragged and miserable they are.

My modus operandi is to have registered the family according to the villages, making record of the amount of property of which they were robbed, how many killed or wounded, if any, etc. Then they are passed over to me and I supply them with clothing from the product of the Industrial Bureau, and give them a ticket for the proper amount of bread to be had daily at the bakery. On Friday and Saturday we thus registered ninety families. Can you imagine not only their gratitude, but our own gratitude to the generous people of America and England, who have thus made it possible to do so much towards relieving the unparalleled distress about us. The fact that we have on hand a large supply of all the kinds of coarse cotton and woolen goods and of heavy carpets which they need for clothing and bedding is one upon which we daily congratulate ourselves.

While THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bakery adds the second and most necessary part to the work of relief, the fact that there are estimated to be some 40,000 families turned out of their village homes in this province will give some idea of the need of aid. And to this must be added probably 10,000 in the greatest distress among the city people. Thanking you most cordially for all your efforts in behalf of this wretched, victimized people, I am,

Yours very truly,
G. W. KIMBALL.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD yesterday forwarded by cable $5,000 to Dr. Kimball through the Bible House Committee at Constantinople as a Christmas donation from Christian America for her relief work.

That THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund is accomplishing good results among the sufferers, notwithstanding many difficulties in the way, and that the avenues of relief are still open to our brave American missionaries, is also proved by a letter received from Rev. H. O. Dwight, of the American Board at Constantinople, in which he acknowledges receipt of the latest remittance from the Fund. Dr. Dwight writes:

"Your telegraphic remittance of $5,000 for relief will go on at once, although we find great difficulty in getting money into the interior. The Turkish Government does not like us to do this work, professing to distrust us. Destitution is fearful. Probably half a million people are without food enough to get through the winter, and no means of earning money. Hundreds have lost home, property, clothing, and are literally clad only in their shirts. Many others have been stripped naked and left to die in the snow.

"There is need of some great organization like the Red Cross Society, under international protection to do the work of distribution in this terrible emergency.

"Happily, Van has not yet been wrecked, and we hope will escape. There are numbers of cities more needy now. We are sending on clothing and other supplies from subscriptions here. Porters, muleteers and steamers can be found glad to carry the supplies without charge.

H. O. DWIGHT."

Private letters received in New York from reliable sources contain accounts of numerous Turkish atrocities in the interior towns and villages. A letter has been addressed to the Armenian Patriarch at Constantinople by the Christians of Baiburt, survivors of the recent massacre, in which, after giving a list of the victims slain by the Moslem mob and the troops, the writer says:

"Only two now remain alive out of the group whose members used to correspond with your Excellency. When the massacres and plundering began on account of the prevailing terror and insecurity, the people were compelled to close all the churches, shops, and schools from Oct. 13 to 26, and take refuge in the houses. During that time letters were sent from our prelate to the commandant of the Fourth Army Corps, at Erzeroum and to the Armenian prelate at Erzeroum asking their assistance, but all our prayers have remained unanswered. After the massacres, the Turks advised us indirectly that the order was secretly given from the Imperial Palace, and was irrevocable! It was on Saturday, October 22, that the fatal hour struck. The frantic Turkish mob, assisted by regular troops, suddenly fell upon the innocent and unarmed Armenians. The bloody work began at 4 o'clock A. M., and lasted until 12 o'clock in the evening (Turkish time). Besides murdering our people, the mob plundered and fired the Armenian dwellings and stores, taking care that the Greeks should not be molested. On that frightful day the Armenian community of Baiburt was almost annihilated.

"Strong men, youths and women and even babes in their cradles, and unborn children in the wombs of their mothers, were butchered. Infants were stuck on bayonets and exposed to the view of their helpless and frantic mothers. Young brides and girls were subjected to a fate that need not be described. No resistance was possible on the part of the Armenians. All the native teachers, with a single exception, were murdered with most cruel tortures. The Turks killed the two young sons of Assout, a priest, and wounded the priest himself. In one day, Baiburt became a slaughter-house. Torrents of blood began to flow. The streets and the bazaars were filled with dead bodies. On the following day the Turks did all in their power to conceal the bodies of those who had been pierced by bayonets. Similar scenes were enacted on a smaller scale in the surrounding villages.

"Mourning and lamentation prevail throughout Armenia. The churches are closed; no more can the sound of worshippers be heard. The pealing of the bells is silent. We have no more teachers to teach the remnant of Armenians who still live. Rich and poor alike have perished, and the survivors are in the direst indigence. No bread, no covering for their nakedness; they are shivering in the cold. Baiburt, until lately so generous to help others, is now helpless, and in need of moral and material assistance. Unless such assistance is soon received, nobody can live.

"After the massacres the government began to arrest the few remaining Armenians who had escaped the slaughter. We hear that in the prisons the tortures have reached an extreme point of frightful cruelty. Thus the survivors of the massacre are now dying daily. Every moment we have the horrors of death."

Turkish duplicity is fertile in its resources. Many documents have been forwarded to the Grand Vizier at Constantinople from scenes of recent massacres, purporting to be signed by Armenian nobles, the signatures having been obtained by intimidation. One of the most remarkable is from Bitlis, and bears the signatures of thirty-one Armenian nobles. It proceeds to state that "some of our co-religionists have been deceived by instigators coming from certain parts, and have been the cause of deplorable events and have committed crimes contrary to the wishes of his Imperial Majesty, and against the government of his Imperial Majesty—a government to be whose subject had been for six hundred years a title of glory to us, and through whose benevolence we were enjoying religious liberty and a self-government, the like of which cannot be found under any administration. This being so there remains no hope for us but the mercy of our august sovereign, who deigns to accept all classes of his subjects with a benevolence worthy of the greatest of monarchs.

"On the other hand, everlasting happiness for us consists in preserving our national existence in the shadow of the imperial government. We dare to commend ourselves to the humanity and benevolence of our sovereign, who is an object of admiration for the whole world, and we implore his pardon, taking refuge in that heavenly power bestowed upon him for the pardon of criminals."

Such is an example of similar documents that have been drawn up by local Turkish officials, in fulsome praise of the Porte's humanity, and which the leading Armenians have been compelled to sign, under threats of imprisonment and torture. These spurious testimonials, like the manufactured reports of outrages by Armenians, are designed to influence public opinion in Turkey's favor.

Even the Porte, accustomed as it is to distort the facts, finds itself no longer able to conceal from the world the pitiable condition of the Armenians. In the district of Sivas many are clothed only with potato sacks, and many have perished of sheer starvation.

The American Red Cross Society has not yet perfected all its arrangements for entering Turkey and assuming charge of the relief work, but President Clara Barton and her associates are pushing matters forward as rapidly as possible. Meanwhile, our own missionaries, as Dr. Kimball's letter shows, are doing splendid service, all having remained at their posts, and each personally managing the relief work in the several districts. All contributions for the Armenian sufferers sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund will be duly acknowledged in these columns, and will be used most effectively under the present arrangement for sending weekly remittances from the Fund by cable to the American missionary workers in Armenia, who have uninterrupted communication with the most needy points. The latest contributions are acknowledged on page 18 of this issue.

A NATIONAL UNION OF CHURCHES.

Denominational Lines not Affected, but all can join in a General Organization for Public Morality, Social Reform and Christian Benevolence.

BY REV. JOSIAH STRONG, D.D.

EVER since the famous Chicago-Lambeth articles appeared, papers, pamphlets, books, magazines, clubs, and ecclesiastical bodies have kept up a discussion of Christian union, until the subject has become a good deal worn and the public a good deal weary. And what have we to show as the net result? Some growth of sentiment in the right direction, but the same number of denominations as before and as much competition between churches as ever. It may well be doubted whether denominations differing as widely as do some, can ever talk themselves together.

Differences in forms of worship are not a serious obstacle. Differences of polity are fit subjects of compromise, but differences of doctrine are not. A conscientious man cannot modify his creed any more than he can modify the multiplication table, simply to please himself or some one else. Discussion of doctrinal differences will not remove them. Discussion is divisive. Is there not some other way?

Dr. Roswell D. Hitchcock said not long before his death, "If Christian union ever comes, it will come through co-operation." While we have been passing fraternal resolutions and exchanging friendly compliments, scores of needed reforms have halted and stumbled for lack of the strong support of united hands, and thousands of men, women, and children have gone to destruction for lack of united effort. I venture to predict that if the churches will try co-operation for ten years as earnestly as they have tried discussion for ten years, they will make vastly more progress toward the desired goal of Christian union, besides accomplishing an amount of Christian work simply incalculable.

The churches are beginning to see that they have a mission to society as well as to the individual. The social reforms which are needed, and for which the churches are responsible, are so vast that their accomplishment without co-operation is simply impossible. And here is a significant fact; the lines along which united work is most needed are the very lines along which the churches can most easily unite their efforts. In government and doctrine they have historical differences, and along these lines it will be very hard for them to unite; but they have no historical differences touching the purification of municipal government; there is no denominational treatment of the temperance question; there isn't any Presbyterian solution of the problem of pauperism, or any peculiar Methodist cure for crime. In the saving of society the churches can easily co-operate. This, then, is the field for united effort. What shall be the method?

Plans have been devised which are the outcome of years of study and of experience. These plans have received the unqualified approval of leaders among all denominations, Baptist, Congregational, Episcopalian, Lutheran, Methodist, Reformed, and Presbyterian. Conservatives and progressive alike commend them; and men like Bishop Vincent and Dr. F. E. Clark, who have a genius for organization, and are the originators of two of the most remarkable movements of modern times, declare that these plans are admirably adapted to accomplish the desired end. Says Bishop Vincent, the plan is "pre-eminently practical and wise;" and Dr. Clark, of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, pronounces it "entirely possible, and very admirably conceived." Dr. Parkhurst, writes: "Your plan has my most hearty indorsement, and I wish that circumstances were such that I could enlist under your standard in its prosecution." Dr. George Hedges, Dean of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass., says: "I have seen so much of the plan actually carried out with harmony and efficiency, that I have confidence to believe that it is all possible." President

Andrews, of Brown University, thinks "the movement might easily prove a new Reformation, more important than the original one." Dr. Stoddard, of the New York Observer, declares it is "all good things in one," and Washington Gladden, of Columbus, O., writes: "This is exactly right, I approve every word of it, and will do what I can to get a branch alliance organized here."

This plan of organizing Church Alliances originated with the Evangelical Alliance for the United States, and is commended by that organization to the churches. It is equally adapted to city and country, large towns and small. Leaflets giving the plan, together with definite lines of work, will be sent gratis on application to the General Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, United Charities Building, New York. The following statement of objects is taken from the constitution suggested for local Alliances:

Believing that Jesus Christ is the only Saviour of society as well as of the individual, it shall be the object of this Alliance to apply the principles of Christ's teachings to the solution of social problems with a view to aiding the churches in the accomplishment of their social mission.

This Alliance shall seek to prove the deep, practical interest of the allied churches in whatever concerns human welfare.

It shall aid such directly religious efforts as it may approve for united action, and further such moral and civic movements as it may deem to be of large importance.

Its objects shall include the aid, in all practical ways, of such existing organizations as, in its judgment, are wisely seeking the common well-being.

The Alliance shall stand in the name of Christ on the side of practical religion, good citizenship, the enforcement of law, the promotion of sobriety, the prevention of cruelty, the alleviation of suffering, the correction of injustice, the rescue of the unfortunate, the reformation of the depraved, and for such kindred ends as pertain to the true social mission of the church; it being understood that all activities of the Alliance shall be subservient to spiritual results, which must always be the supreme object of the churches.

All churches and individuals in sympathy with the above objects are welcome to its membership.

The sour soil in which the hateful root of sectarianism grows is the suspicion (rarely confessed but none the less real) that "our" denomination is a little more loyal to the Lord and a little dearer to Him than any other. When the churches know each other thoroughly this unworthy suspicion will die, and the bond of Christian fellowship will strengthen with the growth of mutual confidence until the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace is perfected. And this bitter knowledge will come when the churches draw near enough to each other to join hands for the accomplishment of common objects.

A Brave Missionary Gone.

News has been received of the death at Sorai, Korea, of Rev. W. J. McKenzie, one of the brightest young missionaries who in recent years has labored for Christ's kingdom in that land. Mr. McKenzie was a native of Nova Scotia, and was a minister of the Presbyterian Church. He went to Chemulpo in 1893, and after studying the language moved to Sorai, where he adopted the Korean manner of living, both as to dress and diet. Under his ministrations the little body of Christians at Sorai largely increased. Throughout the late war and the Tong Hak rebellion, he remained at his post. It is related of him by a friend:

"I heard from a Korean of one of McKenzie's early encounters with a Tong Hak chief. The rebel delivered a tirade against Christianity and ended with a distinct threat against McKenzie's life. In reply McKenzie asked the man to please remember one thing, that Christianity might be foreign and bad, but Korea was in sad need of it just now, for Christianity did not permit its followers to murder the King's officers, destroy government property, rob defenceless country folk and force them into the ranks of insurrectionists. The Korean was nonplussed, and, as he saw McKenzie's six foot three of bone and brawn striding away, concluded he had better have nothing to do with him.

Mr. McKenzie died after a brief illness. His record in Korea is bright with the glory of a beautiful promise undimmed by one single failure. He fell at his post in the front. Heron, Davis, Hall and McKenzie; Paik of We-ju, Kang of Chemulpo, No of Sanddong,—they died on the field of battle and have gone to enrich heaven as Korea's treasures.

A Chinese Convert's Courage.

A missionary of the Scotch United Presbyterian Church has recently forwarded a letter from Liao Yang, China, the station at which Rev. Mr. Wylie was martyred a year ago. The letter speaks of the man by the name of Tang, of whom it says:—

"He was seized by a band of Kirin soldiers, stripped naked, and bound hands and feet. A sword was then held to his throat and he was asked: 'Are you a believer in Jesus?' 'Yes,' said he boldly, 'I am a Christian.' They then went to their officer and asked what they should do with the fellow. But the officer (no doubt remembering the consequence of offences last August) declared he would not interfere. They therefore released him and let him go. Next Sabbath, when he came in to worship, I asked him how it was that he, having so short an experience of the Christian life, and being as yet unbaptized, could speak out so boldly in the presence of death, and he answered that he had just been reading of how Peter had three times denied his Master, and that he afterwards went out and wept bitterly; 'and how,' said he, 'could I deny my Lord? I shall baptize the man when I go back.

Murdered Missionaries.

Mr. and Mrs. Johnson Martyred by the Malagasy at Arivonimamo.

AD news has been received from Madagascar, of the murder of two esteemed and devoted Quaker missionaries by a mob of two thousand natives. Ever since the French began their campaign of conquest and landed troops to subjugate the patriotic Hovas, the country has been in a ferment and no white man or woman's life has been safe. Stung to madness by the injustice of the French claims and the cruelty of the French military leaders who were slaughtering peaceful and defenceless natives in all directions, the Malagasy became fiercely embittered against all foreigners. Especially has this been the case since the capture by the invading troops of Antananarivo, the capital. After that event, the country became infested with scattered marauding bands of native outlaws, composed of soldiers and runaway slaves. A mob of this character attacked the mission station of Arivonimamo, one day's journey from Antananarivo, on the day of the native feast of the "fandroana," and brutally massacred and mutilated Mr. Wm. Johnson and his devoted wife.

Mr. Johnson was a native of London, and went out to Madagascar in 1871, under the auspices of the Friends' Foreign Missionary Association. The next year he married Lucy Sewell, of Leicester, daughter of the founder of the Madagascar Mission of the Friends. Her sister was the wife of Mr. J. C. Thorne, the London Missionary Society's Superintendent of Education. She also died at Antananarivo. The Johnsons were both singularly quiet people, and, indeed, were beloved of everyone who knew them. Mr. Johnson, who was Head Master of the Friends' High School in Antananarivo, and subsequently took charge of a group of congregations in the country, had considerable architectural ability, and drew plans for many of the mission buildings in Imerina, including that of the present hospital near the capital. He was always ready to render practical help when called upon; and his wife, Lucy, was a veritable Mother in Israel, going hither and thither nursing the sick and comforting the afflicted, both amongst the natives and her fellow-countrywomen, to the very best of her ability. Their loss under such distressing circumstances will be universally mourned. Associated with them was Miss Ethel Clark, daughter of H. E. Clark, of Antananarivo, who providentially escaped the massacre.

It is not as yet absolutely certain whether Mr. and Mrs. Johnson's child, Lucy, was killed with her mother. She was five years old. They had three older children who are now being educated abroad. The tragic death of the beloved missionaries has saddened a very large circle of friends in England and America.

best of her ability. Their loss under such distressing circumstances will be universally mourned. Associated with them was Miss Ethel Clark, daughter of H. E. Clark, of Antananarivo, who providentially escaped the massacre.

Converts in Childhood.

Many of the brightest lights in the history of Christianity have been converted in early life. Adam Clarke, the commentator, was converted at four years of age. His influence will shine in the moral heavens while the sun shines in the natural heavens. Alfred Cookman, the great revivalist, was converted at ten years of age. He will shine in the kingdom of God as the stars in the firmament of heaven forever and ever, and thousands will rise in the judgment and call him blessed. Isaac Watts, the great poet, was converted at the age of nine years. His influence will be felt through the endless ages of eternity. Robert Hall was converted at twelve, Jonathan Edwards at seven, and William Penn at nine.

Jerusalem's Peace Manaced.

Mrs. David Jamal whose Training School, in Jerusalem, for poor Syrian girls is supported by the contributions of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, writes that the ancient city is in a state of unrest, consequent upon the troubles in Armenia. She says: "The atmosphere of affairs at present is totally upset, owing to the present state of affairs in Turkey. My class, I am glad to say, is going on very nicely, and the girls are very clever. Some of the Armenian girls of the class have not been able, for the last two weeks, to attend as the Armenian Patriarch officially announced that all Armenians, men and women, must stick as close as possible to their houses, and not go further than the Jaffa gate. That is all done to avoid contact with the Turkish military recruits who are in great number in Jerusalem, preparing for their journey to the Hauran to attack the Druzes who are said to have behaved very badly and ill-treated the neighboring villages—both Moslem and Christian. It is reputed that the Druzes have shown obstinacy against the Turkish Government. Last Thursday, however, I am glad to say, the Armenian girls attended the class. When work was over, my husband escorted them as far as the Armenian quarters. R. D. JAMAL."

The Message on Venezuela.

PATRIOTIC in every line, the Message of the President to Congress on the Venezuelan boundary question has been received with enthusiasm by the whole country. Its tone leaves no room for doubt as to the determination of the Administration to uphold those vital principles that have become part of the nation's life and character, and which oppose any attempt on the part of a European power, to unduly interfere with affairs on this continent, or to aggrandize itself at the expense of a sister Republic. The effect of the Message on Congress has been electric. Political parties and factions have been sunk out of sight in the unanimous patriotic desire to stand by the Executive in upholding the dignity and honor of the American people.

Our Government having effectually demonstrated its position on the Monroe doctrine, the next and wisest step is to await, with patience and calmness, the result of the Commission's work in ascertaining the exact facts concerning the disputed boundary line. This task will doubtless require many weeks of careful labor. Meanwhile, and until that duty is accomplished and the result announced to the Congress, let our democratic hearts be as before, a great nation, conscious of its power and of the greatness of its purposes. Congress will doubtless furnish the means necessary to preparation for all emergencies, and our people stand ready to do their part in defense of the national honor. It is, however, hardly conceivable that the two greatest Christian nations of the world to-day should fail to reach a peaceful solution of this difficulty. This is the age of arbitration. War at all times is an evil, and where it can be honorably averted, it is an evil absolutely without mitigation. There may be—there doubtless will be—many who, carried along by the current of impetuous feeling at present prevailing, do not recognize this; yet we do not apprehend that either government will be swayed by other than the most serious and most judicial view of this Venezuelan matter. The best element on both sides the Atlantic hopes for a pacific solution, and such a hope may be indulged by all Americans, without loss of self-respect.

Let us trust and pray that the Almighty, who holds in his hands the issues of war and peace, may so direct the counsels of the opposing Cabinets that the war-cloud may after a time be dispersed, and that the bright sun of peace and international friendship may again shine forth.

Warming Up.

NOTWITHSTANDING all the modern apparatus for heating buildings, nothing will ever have the sociability or cheer of the old-time country fireplace. The neighbors were to come in for a winter evening of sociability. In the middle of the afternoon, a big log was carried in with heavy strain and put on the hearth. Lighter wood was added, armful after armful. A shovel of living coals from another room was put amidst the dry pile. The kindling and crackling began, and rose toward the chimney in a great roar of flame that by nightfall filled all the room with pleasantness, and was reflected from the family pictures hanging all round the wall. Then the neighbors came in, one by one, and sat down with their faces to the fire, which was again and again stirred with tongs, and put aright on the andirons, and there were such times of rustic repartee and story-telling and mirth as no blind stove or black register ever knew about. Well the Church of God is the warm fireplace for the great neighborhood of Christian disciples. The wood is from the forests of Lebanon. The fires are fires of love, and we stir them with the silver tongues of the altar, and the light is reflected from the old family picture on the wall of those who once sat here, but are all gone now. Come up to the fire! Let it transfigure your faces wizened with care! Put those feet, cold with the journey, close up by the heavenly conflagration. Chilled through with the neglect, and misjudgments, and troubles of life, come so near you can get warmed clear through.

Medical Triumphs.

WHAT an ingenious theory that was, only a few years ago started, out of which all the recent discoveries came, that much of the vegetation and much of animal life and much of human life is cursed with parasites. It is positively demonstrated by these modern doctors that disease is merely the attempt of other life to feed on human life, and when these parasites attack one part of the human frame it is consumption, and when they attack another part it is cancer, and another part it is diphtheria, and another part it is Russian grip. What a triumph of medical science to have found out these foes of our race, for now there will be more probability of extirpating these bandits of human life. Henceforth the whole system of treatment of disease has changed, and how great is the responsibility of our medical colleges that they now start their students in the new and right direction. The twentieth century will laugh to scorn ailments that terrify and confound the nineteenth century. There are soon to be no hospitals for incurables, for every-thing can be cured. The Bible says the leaves of the Tree of Life are for the healing of the nations, and there is a leaf for every wound, an antidote for every poison, a death blow to every parasite. If the influences which God has started for the improvement of the world's condition are as radical and potent as I believe them to be, the time is coming when there will be only two ways of dying,—by old age and by accident. All success to the doctors!

We call the attention of every reader of this journal to the communication from Rev. Dr. Strong, which appears on another page. Such a union of Christian churches for the attainment of objects that all Christian denominations are striving for, should command the earnest support of every thoughtful mind. With such an organization perfected throughout this country, a world of good might be accomplished in the direction of Christian progress, public morality, and far-reaching benevolences. The greatest need of the present day is effective organization on the lines indicated. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be pleased to receive an expression of opinion from its readers on the subject.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Missionaries and Christian workers in foreign lands, who are receiving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through the kindness of subscribers are requested to write us concerning the progress of their missionary labors. Such communications, when of real interest, will be published.

D. L. Hildreth, Newport Centre, Vt., writes:

In renewing my subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I beg to say that I have found it so helpful and consoling in my life work for the past four or five years, that it is now considered a fixture with my family and a necessity to myself.

J. W., Maspeth, N. Y. Where can I find a full and intelligent review or condensation of the Monroe doctrine, which is the basis of our contention with Great Britain?

Probably the best exposition recently issued is to be found in the "American Citizen's Handbook," one of the ten volumes included in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Library which is given as a premium with this journal for a year's subscription at three dollars.

Mr. E. W., Rochelle, Ill. The good book says believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. Does that mean merely an intellectual or heart belief?

By no means; it refers to a full, living belief in which head, heart and whole being alike share—a belief that so fills our being that it compels expression in thought and word and deed. Mere intellectual belief is a morally dead belief. The devil and his angels believe in that way. (See James 2: 19.)

J. H. E., Portland, Oreg. The only reliable and available method of sending relief funds to Armenia, we believe to be that now followed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through its arrangement with the American Board. Money sent direct to any missionary, there in all probability, would never reach its destination. Any sum sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund and specially intended for any particular missionary, would reach that missionary through this channel. The condition of affairs in Armenia would render it difficult for a missionary to enter into correspondence, beyond possibly, a simple grateful acknowledgment.

H. W. T., Gettysburg, Pa. 1. Is it right to ask children to believe in "Santa Claus"? 2. Is the offer you make to subscribers during Christmas still good?

1. If told to them as a myth or legend, common to many nations, which has its foundation in the gift of the Christ-child, they will not be led into a wrong belief. Many of the most beautiful customs of Christian countries are founded on ancient legends. As the child grows older he will understand the origin and significance of these customs. 2. Yes, the offer is still open.

A. B., East Greenwich, R. I. Did the steward mentioned in Luke 16: 9, do right? His conduct seems dishonest according to our standards. Why did Christ commend him?

Jesus did not commend the steward. It was the steward's lord who commended him, and that not for his dishonesty but for his astuteness. The man undoubtedly did wrong in defrauding his employer. Christ used the parable to show the foresight exercised by men of no moral principle. When they see that they are about to lose their position they make provision for the future, by rendering service to people then beneath them in rank who will be able to serve them when the need comes. If Christ's followers acted even on that mercenary motive, they would seek out the poor and needy of his people and provide for them, because God has promised to reward those who do so. But they do not show so much shrewdness as worldly people do. That is the apparent meaning of the parable.

M. B., Visalia, Cal. 1. What kind of anger is that Paul speaks of in Ephesians 4: 26, as being without sin? 2. Does the statement in Timothy 4: 11, that God is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe, imply that all men will be saved in the end?

1. The kind that is aroused by wickedness and outrage and cruel wrong. The Christian who hears of such cruelties as those now being perpetrated in Armenia, naturally feels anger at the monster who sits on the Turkish throne, and the European potentates who suffer him to sit there, and there is no sin in such anger. It is righteous indignation. And in this country when we see the poor defrauded, simple people cheated and the innocent tempted into lives of shame, our anger is justifiable; there is no sin in it. But it is liable to lead us to commit sin, if it causes us to do violence or to be uncharitable and unforgiving. 2. No, the passage does not teach that. God is the benefactor of all; he "sendeth rain on the just and the unjust." All men are saved by him from innumerable ills that would come on a world without a God. He is also potentially their Saviour, inasmuch as he is ready to save every man who will come to him to be saved, but there is no encouragement in the passage for any man who does not avail himself of his offer of salvation from sin.

W. A., Limestoneville, Pa. Does the woe pronounced by Christ (Matt. 24: 19) imply a disapproval of marriage?

No, it refers to a time of terrible affliction when hurried flight would be the only means of saving life. The "woe" was not uttered in denunciation, but was a prediction that women in such condition would be great sufferers, not being able to endure the hardships of flight.

Mrs. J., Glen Arbor, Mich. Does the passage about property (Isa. 65: 21, 22) apply to the life in heaven?

No; it refers to the Millennial time of blessedness on earth when people will enjoy the fruit of their labors, and one man will not toil and live in poverty while another lives in idleness and luxury on the proceeds of the other's labor. It will be a time when justice will be done in social life on the earth.

J. M. J., Bradford, Tenn. Was Cornelius (Acts 10: 1-35), when Peter went to him, a man who would now be called a converted man?

From the description given and from Peter's commendation, we infer that he would be considered a strictly moral, but not a converted man. He was living up to the light he had, and striving to please God. Probably he had not heard the Gospel preached until Peter preached it to him, though we gather from verse 37 that he knew in a general way of the mission of Christ. His conversion appears to have occurred under Peter's preaching.

J. C. J., South Dakota. Several times since my conversion I have fallen into sin, knowing that it was sin, yet not deterred by the fact. Is there hope of my being forgiven, or do such passages as Heb. 10: 26, 31, n. Peter 2: 20, 22 preclude hope?

Do not suffer despair to enter your heart. The mercy of God is infinite toward those who plead for it. The passages to which you refer are a warning to those who continue in sin. To those who loathe it and strive to avoid it, as your letter shows that you do, pardon will be freely granted. But do not forget that divine power to overcome is placed at your disposal and you must seek it earnestly. It is a grievous thing for one whom Christ has redeemed to fall into sin.

W. H. L., Seattle, Wash., H. H. Cockran and others. What are the exact words of the Didache giving directions as to baptism? Do you consider the Didache authoritative?

Chapter VII of the Didache, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, as translated from the Greek, reads: "Now concerning baptism, thus baptize ye: having first uttered all these things [the contents of previous chapters], baptize into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, in living water. But if thou hast not living water, baptize in other water, and if thou canst not in cold, then in warm. But if thou hast neither, pour water on the head thrice into the name of the Father and Son and Holy Spirit." It is part of a manuscript found in a monastery at Constantinople, and is the only copy known to be in existence. Athanasius who died in 373 and other early writers refer to the existence of such a work, but until 1873 no copy of it had been found. The Teaching appears to have been composed about 120, but this particular copy was not made before 1056. It is authoritative only so far as it indicates the practice of the early church. Eusebius, who died in 340, appears to have entertained doubts about the work, as he speaks of it as "The So-called Teaching of the Apostles."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Preparing for War.

THE latent animosity toward England over the Venezuelan difficulty was brought to an acute stage on Dec. 17th, by President Cleveland's message to Congress. The President informed Congress that he had received the reply of the English Government to his last request that England submit her dispute with the Government of Venezuela to arbitration. Lord Salisbury's reply, the President considered, indicated no prospect of his yielding. He therefore suggested that Congress authorize him to appoint a Commission to investigate the English claim on Venezuela and to report on its merits. The basis of such a proposal was, of course, the Monroe doctrine, which makes the United States the champion of any State in this hemisphere, against the encroachment of a European power. Whether the proceedings of England constitute an encroachment is the question at issue between her and Venezuela. The territory in dispute is that part marked in the accompanying map with a dotted line. It has been the subject of controversy since the year 1840. England claims that the Dutch, from whom in 1814 she acquired by treaty the territory now known as British Guiana, held possession of the whole region as far as the part marked with a dark line in the map. Venezuela insists that all territory north and west of the river, Essequibo, belongs to her. In 1844 an attempt was made to settle the difficulty, and Sir Robert Schomburgk was employed by England to make a boundary line. He started from a point west of Point Barima, where the remains of an old Dutch fort showed that the Dutch had certainly been in possession, and drew his line in a south-westerly direction to the northern frontier of British Guiana, advising England to waive her claims to all territory west of that line. Lord Aberdeen, who was the British Foreign Minister at the time, agreed, and even consented to waive a part of the territory on the British side of Schomburgk's line, if Venezuela would accept that boundary and agree never to transfer the territory given up to her to any foreign power. Venezuela made no reply to this proposal, and in 1850 England notified her that it was withdrawn. Since then several attempts have been made to settle the boundary, but without success. Finally, in 1887, Venezuela offered to accept the proposal made to her in 1844, but in the interval many British subjects had settled in the territory England had been willing to give up, and the British government replied that the concession could not then be made. They were willing, however, to submit all territory beyond the Schomburgk line to arbitration. Then Venezuela revived her claim to the Essequibo boundary and so the matter now stands. President Cleveland's proposal that a Commission be appointed to investigate the merits of this dispute, was cordially received by Congress and there was an enthusiastic outburst of approval of his declaration that it would be the duty of the United States to resist, "by every means in its power," any attempt on the part of England to retain possession of any territory which the Commission might decide did not rightly belong to her. Congress clearly apprehended the tendency of the President's proposal and not only voted money for the expenses of the Commission, but proceeded to make provision for the purchase of rifles, heavy guns and other munitions of war. It is most devoutly to be hoped that they will never be needed. A war between the United States and England would be an appalling calamity to both nations. The spectacle of such a conflict would also retard the progress of civilization and the propagation of the Gospel of Peace which both nations have been preaching to barbarous peoples. In this crisis it is the manifest duty of every Christian to pray that the statesmen of both nations may be kept from mistakes and be led to follow the Apostolic advice: Let us therefore follow the things which make for peace. (Rom. 14: 19.)

A House Afloat.

A remarkable feat of engineering has just been successfully accomplished in California. The owner of a large two-story house at Arcata had business reasons for wishing to have it in the neighborhood of Eureka. The most simple plan would have been to sell the house, and buy or build one at Eureka. But he found that the transaction would involve a heavy loss. He, therefore, determined to remove the house bodily. He arranged with a firm of San Francisco engineers to undertake the difficult work. The distance between the two places is twelve miles. The first difficulty was to transport the house over a morass to the river bank. This was satisfactorily accomplished, and the house was set securely on lighters lashed together. A tug took it safely to the bay opposite Eureka, where a large crowd assembled to witness its arrival. The dwelling was transferred to land again, and was easily conveyed to its new site. A slight cracking of the plaster in the ceilings of two rooms was the only indication of the house having made its journey from the one town to the other. This is probably the longest distance a house was ever conveyed bodily. The owner has a novel experience, for when a man removes from one town to another, he always expects to leave his house behind him. We may hope that when the time comes for the owner to make his last removal to the land beyond the grave, to which he cannot take his house nor even the dwelling in which his soul resides, he will not be distressed by the fear of being homeless. If he attains the faith of the Apostle, he will be assured of a better home, and be able to say with him:

I know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, I have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. (II. Cor. 5: 1.)

The World's Greatest Dam.

A stupendous engineering enterprise has just been completed in India. It appears that the range of mountains known as the Western Ghats, dividing at one part of their course the provinces of Travancore and Madura, mark a striking contrast of climate. On the Travancore side the rivers flow perennially, and there is abundance of rain; while on the Madura side, the monsoons that bring rain, often fail and the rivers become dry and the country arid. An officer who had charge of the district in 1808, conceived a plan for conveying water from Travancore through the hills to Madura. It was then pronounced chimerical, but at intervals since, it has been revived. In 1882, Major Pen-

BRIEF NOTES.

The Salvation Army in its Philanthropic Department now finds employment in its factories and workshops for 10,700 persons, men and women.

A Number of Stundist Preachers who are banished to Trans Caucasia, having served their sentences for preaching were required to sign an undertaking that they would not repeat the offence. On their refusal they were sentenced to a further term of five years.

Several Missionaries in the Neighborhood of Kan-suh, China, have been notified that they should hold themselves in readiness for flight to Hankow. A rebellion is being organized to overthrow the dynasty, and the lives of foreigners will be in peril when it breaks out.

Rev. E. B. Sanford, D.D., has been Appointed Corresponding Secretary to the Institutional Church League, the object of which is to promote the growing movement among the churches on behalf of the non-church-going classes. His address is 506 Madison avenue, New York.

The Presbyterian General Assemblies of Australia and Tasmania have accomplished a form of federation. The moneys for missions are brought together under one organization, and there is to be a uniform system of theological training with the same standard of qualification for the ministry.

A Wealthy New York Lady has Presented the Church Temperance Society with a handsome wagon for its work in the city. It is proposed to utilize it for the sale of tea, coffee, temperance drinks, and rolls at cost price. The wagon will be taken from one part of the city to another, stand in some open place for half an hour, and customers will be served from it. A poor man with only a few cents in his pocket will, it is hoped, prefer to spend them at the wagon instead of the saloon.

Herr Ahlwardt, the Anti-Semitic Agitator, has arrived in this country for the purpose of uniting the working-classes against the Jews. At his first meeting in New York, some indiscreet persons pelted him with rotten eggs. This is to be regretted. It may be hoped that in other cities less objectionable means will be taken to show him that he is unwelcome, but Ahlwardt, wherever he goes, ought not to be left in any doubt as to the fact. We do not want any man here stirring up rancor against any class or race.

Rev. Peter Stryker, D.D., Commences his ministry at Asbury Park, N. J., this week. His labors at the Thirty-fourth Street Reformed Church in New York during the past six years have been greatly blessed to the church. Dr. Stryker was pastor of the same church from 1856 to 1868 and under his ministry it grew to a strong and aggressive organization. He left it to accept a call to Philadelphia returning to it in 1890 after an absence of twenty-two years. The church has now passed into the hands of the Collegiate Reformed Church.

There are now in Japan Twenty-nine Protestant missionary societies, with 226 male and 210 unmarried female missionaries. They occupy 124 stations and 750 out-stations. The organized churches number 364, with a membership of nearly 40,000. The native Japanese ministers number 754. The deputation recently sent to Japan by the American Board is now on its way home. Its report has not yet been presented, but it is understood that they found the native churches better prepared to carry on aggressive work than they had been led to expect, and the relations between the churches and the missionaries were cordial.

Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Missionary of the Sunday School Union, had a most successful year's labor in Missouri. The work done by these devoted laborers is of inestimable value. In many country districts, where they have organized schools there were absolutely no religious privileges for miles around. It has happened in hundreds of instances that the school has developed into a church. Mr. Sharp writes that last year the missionaries of that department organized no less than six hundred and one schools. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have had a part in this good work, inasmuch as they have provided the funds, for five years past, with which Mr. Sharp has been kept in the field. We trust they will authorize us to continue his services next year. The work is undenominational.

THEY BLESS THE BOWERY MISSION.

A Multitude Who Have Found Spiritual Peace and Lasting Happiness Within Its Hospitable Gates—The Record of Nine Months' Earnest Work.

ALTHOUGH only nine months have elapsed since the old Bowery Mission entered upon a new lease of life under its present management, these months embrace what is, in some respects, the most eventful period of its history. To the thousands who knew the old mission—the pioneer of its kind—its present aspect is that of an old friend with a new face. In no essential particular has it been changed from what it was under its founder and conductors in the old days, when it was a strong bulwark for righteousness in the centre of a vast population, including the very worst criminal and tramp element in the metropolis. In those days the Mission was a beacon-light to the wanderer and the storm-tossed sinner, a Gospel of welcome and helpfulness in all weathers and under all conditions. To-day, it is conducted on precisely similar lines, but it has broadened and deepened its religious channels and its ramifications embrace an area never reached before. Not only have its spiritual activities been re-energized and quickened but it has taken hold of the hearts of a great multitude of God's people all over the Union, who are in the closest bonds of sympathy with it at every point and whose prayers ascend for it daily. And not a day passes in which earnest seekers after the better life do not write requesting the prayers of the Sunday Afternoon Converts' Meeting, either for themselves or for some dear one who is still out of Christ and whom they desire to bring into the Christian life. This spiritual kinship, reaching across a Continent, has been a great source of moral strength to the Mission during these nine months past.

Both in the nightly services and in the Sunday afternoon Prayer Meetings spiritual strength has developed. At these meetings and the services held on Sunday morning by Mrs. Bird, during the nine months, 5,112 souls have professed conversion. As many as one hundred and ten made such profession in one day. Out of the number of professed conversions there is always a very substantial percentage who remain firm and show that their pledges were not merely empty words but intended to be faithfully kept.

Located in the centre of the wickedest quarter of the city, a great thoroughfare where vice and crime are prevalent to an alarming degree, the Mission is a resting place for many who are wearied and tired with the excitements and allurements of sin, and it is in this place that their hearts are directed again to the teachings and early training of their childhood. The Sunday morning services, and the services on Thursday night, are conducted by Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, who feeds at her own expense about three hundred and fifty homeless men twice a week, and conducts her services the year round without intermission. Thus nearly forty thousand souls are nourished both temporally and spiritually out of the private funds of this Christian home.

Success has followed the establishment of a restaurant in connection with the mission for the purpose of supplying plain substantial meals to those who have no regular home or dwelling-place, children of misfortune and sin, yet who, if a helping hand be extended to them, are ready to take courage and try to do better, with God's help. Many a poor young fellow—doubtless some "mother's boy"—not many years ago—is stranded in the great city through dissipation or inadvertence, and his few pennies, if he be fortunate enough to have any, cannot buy him a meal at any ordinary restaurant. At the mission he can find wholesome food in abundance, and even though he cannot pay, he will not be turned hungry from its hospitable door. Its clean, freshly-aired dormitories, inviting, though plain, its large, comfortable reading-room, and its restaurant with seats to accommodate over 100 at once, in conjunction with the excellent spiritual influences that surround its inmates, make it really what it is: the model home for young men who, sick of sin and its surroundings, are glad to find such a haven of rest. In the Restaurant 381,572 meals were furnished, a goodly percentage of those who have in the past nine months been redeemed not only from a fallen, vicious life, but raised from impecuniosity to positions of trust and confidence, making themselves self-supporting and self-respecting citizens. No mission in the city is so favorably located for dealing with the prodigal and the unfortunate as the Bowery Mission, for the neighborhood of the Bowery is a maelstrom that draws its victims from the four quarters of the earth.

Many who come there and fall into the snares of the East Side are strangers from other cities, who, finding themselves friendless, after a hard experience drift, all stranded and penniless, to the door of the Bowery Mission. Sons, fathers, husbands and relatives have thus been rescued, reclaimed and restored through the instrumentality of the Bowery Mission, whose gate is ever open to the friendless and the wanderer.

During the year the work of the Mission has been greatly helped and encouraged by the kindly sympathy of many friends who have written us, announcing their desire to become interested in the spiritual and material progress of the work. Some few have already shown their patronage to be of the practical sort by contributing toward the expense of conducting the Mission, and others have intimated being gratuitous. At the Free Dispensary, which was added to the work on August 20 last, 640 people have been treated, it being the only Free Dispensary on the Bowery. The lodgings of the Home have accommodated 28,860, of which many were free; and respectable employment has been secured for 704 idle men.

In the restaurant no applicant is turned away who applies for food. In the lodging house a similar rule is observed, though with some discrimination. It is intended that the Bowery Mission shall be a helping-hand to those who are in distress and in need, and who have, either through misfortune, or perhaps their own misconduct, reached a point where they are without friends or hope. No recommendations or letters of introduction are required as a basis upon which help is extended, it being part of the principle of the Mission that "he who cannot furnish character or recommendation, stands, perhaps, most in need of help." Every effort is made to turn the applicant's face toward God, and after this has been done, every effort is made to secure for him some means by which he can earn an honest livelihood. Instances are numerous, extending up into the hundreds, a similar purpose. Necessarily, the expansion of the work of the Mission has involved an outlay considerably in excess of that of previous years, but the record of the nine months just closed leaves room for the hope that another year may see the Mission in the position of a self-supporting Christian work, still expanding and able to do better and more effective service for the Master than at any time in its previous history.

Their Faith Lent Them Courage.

IN the narrative of the loss of the ship Kent (East Indiaman), it is recorded that when the vessel was on fire, several of the soldiers' wives and children, who had fled for temporary shelter into the after-cabins on the quarter deck, were engaged in prayer and in reading the Scriptures with the ladies, some of whom were enabled, with wonderful self-possession, to offer to others those spiritual consolations which a firm and intelligent trust in the Redeemer of the world appeared that awful hour to impart to their own breasts.

The dignified deportment of two young ladies in particular formed a specimen of natural strength of mind, finely modified by Christian feeling, that failed not to attract the notice and admiration of everyone who had an opportunity of witnessing it. On the melancholy announcement being made to them that all hope must be relinquished, and that death was rapidly and inevitably approaching, one of the ladies above referred to, calmly sinking down upon her knees and clasping her hands together, said, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus!" and immediately proposed to read a portion of the Scriptures to those around her; and her sister, with nearly equal composure and collectedness of mind, selected the forty-sixth and other appropriate Psalms, which were accordingly read with intervals of prayer, by those ladies alternately, to the assembled females.

Idols Rejected.

Miss Leggett, a missionary at She-k-i-lien, in China, relates the following: "Recently one of our girls was married. She is not quite sixteen years of age. The betrothal was made in her infancy, before the knowledge of the Gospel had penetrated into the town, and as the bridegroom-elect was still in 'nature's darkness,' there was no way of escaping from the heathen practices which are indulged in on such occasions. However, the bride had a plan whereby she hoped to avoid bowing down to worship the native idols, and when that point in the ceremonies was reached, and the bridegroom prostrated himself on the ground, she quietly sat down. But the eyes of her relatives were upon her, and five women rushed forward, and, applying their strength to her shoulders and limbs, forced her down on her face. The poor child was helpless in their hands, and a moment afterward, rose from the ground crying bitterly. When her husband asked her to join with him in worshipping Lao-tsie-ie (the kitchen god), she flatly refused, saying, 'You must worship the paper yourself; I shall never join you, even if you kill me.' A few days later she sent a message to us, saying, 'I am still trusting Jesus, and mean to do so till I die.' Now we hear that she is teaching her husband hymns, and that he, too, is learning to pray to Jesus. She is also allowed to worship on Sabbath."

The Missionary Civilizer.

The broad international effects of mission work are beginning to make themselves felt, and will do so more and more. In Central Africa for instance, where the German sphere embraces the work of some English missionaries, the representatives of German authority have shown themselves both considerate and just. They have shown an appreciation of the work done, and perceive that the missionary will make the native a kind of man whom it will be profitable for foreigners to rule and trade with.

MOTHER.

SHE was an angel in our home,
And God to her had given Wisdom to lead our erring feet,
The narrow way to heaven.
Her prayers were heard, her teachings blest,
Her work on earth was done;
God called her—and how suddenly
Her heavenly life begun!
Can she, who loved so lavishly,
Now only out of sight,
Be colder, more forgetful grown,
There in God's full love-light?
No, mother dear, we feel thy love
Around us every day;
Thy sweet voice seems to cheer us on,
From o'er the starry way.
A little while, and oh! how sweet
Will that bright meeting be;
When gathered in our Father's house,
We'll love eternally.

Little Princess Olga.

The Russian Royal Baby Baptized at the Tsarkoe-Selo Palace.

AMONG the many "mites of humanity" born into the world during the latter part of 1895, few have had a tithe of the attentions paid to them that were lavished upon the wee Russian maiden, who recently came to cheer the home of the young Czar and his royal consort. The royal Court was astir and there were great rejoicings throughout the empire when the news came of the little maid's arrival. Within a few hours thereafter, as is the custom in the Russian Church, she received her name, and it is a remarkably pretty one, in Russian eyes at least. Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna, they all declared, was a handsome baby, and the old ladies of the Court predicted a brilliant future for her, while the younger ones almost envied her, for many reasons. When she was eight days old she was taken to Tsarkoe-Selo to be baptized. At the actual baptism of a child, according to the Russian Church, the father and mother are not allowed to be present; so while this sacrament was being administered, the Czar retired to an inner room of the palace and there waited until the ceremony was over. Afterward he entered the church, and, with the Czarina, followed by two pages, took the little princess to the place designated where he was to receive the first communion. The artist in illustration (from the London Graphic) has shown the baby in the arms of its father just after the baptismal ceremony.

The Russian Church is one of the oldest Christian institutions in the world. According to a tradition, up to the ninth century there was not a Christian church in the land, which was then ruled over by Ruric. The Apostle Andrew had long before planted the first Christian cross at Kiev. It may be that there were converts here, even at that early period, but there are no authentic records. Strangely enough, the first recorded Christian baptism in Russia was that of a royal lady who bore the same name as the little grand-duchess who was carried to the front a few weeks ago. The convert was Olga, the widow of Igor, who ruled Russia early in the tenth century, and who was Regent during the minority of her son, Svatoslav. She visited the Patriarch Theophylact in Constantinople, and there was baptized. She afterward changed her name to Helena and returned to her own country; but to the close of her life she was compelled to worship in secret. It was the great desire of this royal lady that her son also should become a convert to Christianity, but in this she was disappointed. However, the triumph of the new faith came in the succeeding generation, for Olga's grandson, Vladimir I., not only embraced Christianity himself, but influenced multitudes of his people to follow his example. Vladimir was called by his contemporaries, "Isapostolos" (apostle-like), because of his missionary character. It was a bright day for Christianity, when, without active resistance, the people yielded to the wish of Vladimir to be baptized, and cast the images of Peroun and other heathen gods into the river Dnieper. His son, Yaroslav, in the eleventh century, completed the conversion of the Russian nation, who have ever since remained true to the Christian faith. Vladimir is the patron saint of the nation, and the memory of Olga, the first convert, is now revived by the recent baptism at the beautiful Tsarkoe-Selo Palace.

Be Kind to the Brutes.

Abraham Lincoln, says a writer in Our Dumb Animals, would as soon have cut off his right arm as have spent a summer in the Adirondacks shooting deer for fun. Grant was noted for his kindness to dumb animals. So was Garfield. Sherman was Vice-President of the Missouri Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Custer changed his line of march to pass around the nest of a mother bird and her young. No Southern general, to our knowledge, ever rode a mutilated horse. Wellington, the greatest of English commanders, gave special orders for the protection of a toad in the garden where it had established its home. Bismarck's dog has been almost as well known in Germany as Bismarck, and the Queen of England is the head of humane work in that country. Herein is a good lesson for our girls and boys, of kindness and consideration to the dumb creation.

Children and Money.

Let children know something of the worth of money, by earning it. Over-pay them if you will, but let them get some idea of equivalents. If they get distorted notions of values at the start, they will never be righted. Daniel Webster knew everything except how to use money. From boyhood he had things mixed up. His mother gave him and Ezekiel money for Fourth of July. As the boys came back from the village, the mother said, "Daniel, what did you buy with your money?" and he answered: "I bought a cake and a candy, and some apples, and some fire-crackers." Then turning to Ezekiel, she said, "What did you buy with your money?" "Oh," said Ezekiel, "Daniel borrowed mine," which was true. On the other hand, it is a ruinous policy to be parsimonious.

distressed the Christian conscience; the omission has. Christians who apologize for the neglect of this duty presume on their inability. In this they dishonor God. They will receive assistance from God if they were to make a humble and faithful experiment. The apostle said that he could do all things through Christ assisting him. Certainly, all Christians secretly admit the obligations of family prayer. No man has ever died regretting that he has an altar in his house. How about the many who have died without the altar? There is no surer sign of religious deterioration than the neglect of the family altar. There ought to be a great revival on the line of family altars throughout the Church.

A New Amusement.

WE are pleased with the spelling contests in which all villages and cities occasionally participate. Good will come from them, not only in the boisterous hilarities which have been created, but in the improved mental calibre of the people. Now we propose a new form of amusement, for these long winter evenings, namely, a grammar match. We sometimes positively enjoy the brawny smashing of the English language by some old Christian man who never saw a grammar in all his life, but whose heart is so full of holiness that he can sway a religious meeting and carry everything before him. But we consider it a positive shame, when a grammar will cost only fifty cents, and one hour's study a day for one year would make an ordinary mind capable of understanding the structure of our English language, that so many of our young men and middle-aged men go blundering through their prayers and exhortations, thus depleting their influence for good by one half. The little children of this day are having so many opportunities of perfecting themselves in the study of grammar, that when in our religious assemblages they hear men 'distorting and outraging the language at every step, putting "them" for "those," and "is" for "are," and "I seen" for "I saw," and "I done it" for "I did it," and "they was" for "they were," the young people turn their heads away and say within themselves: "That man cannot teach me anything, for I know more than he does now." It would be well for ministers of the Gospel to purchase fifty or a hundred English grammars and distribute them among those who take part in religious service. If the pastor has the confidence of the people they would gladly take his suggestion. Laymen go on from year to year with this little "dead fly in the ointment" of their public services, because the fly has never been pointed out to them. Suppose, then, we have a few grammar matches! Let us choose sides, and see who can parse a sentence without breaking down. What wonder if some little child should carry off the palm for being the best grammarian!

Babies in Pastures Green.

A writer who has recently made a bicycle tour around the world told of a quaint and pretty sight he saw in an out-of-the-way part of China, where the people have many quaint customs: "I saw about twenty Chinese infants tethered to stakes on a patch of green sward, like so many goats or pet lambs. The length of each baby's tether was about ten feet, and the bamboo stakes were set far enough apart so that the babies wouldn't get all tangled up. Each baby had a sort of girdle, or kammer-bund around its waist, and the end of the tether string was tied to the back of this. Some of the Celestials were crawling about on all fours; others were taking their first lessons in the feat of standing upright, by steadying themselves against the stake they were tied to. What queer little Chinese mortals they all looked, to be sure, picketed out on the grass land like a lot of young calves whose mothers were away for the day! In this respect they did, indeed, resemble young calves; for I could see their mothers at work in a rice-field, a few hundred yards away. All the babies seemed quietly contented with their treatment. I stood and looked at them for several minutes, from pure amusement, at their unique position; but, although, they regarded me with wide-eyed curiosity, I never heard a whimper from any of them."

Home Altars.

The family altar is the bulwark of the home. Prayer is an essential part of the service of God. No Christian can suppose that family prayer is not more pleasing to God than the omission of it. We ought in all things to please God; thus we honor him. The practice of family prayer never

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

CHAPTER VIII.

Lifting the Fallen.

HE spring came and passed, and the summer began to wane.

To a great degree, Silverdale had fallen back into its own ways, and the winter's great revival was a thing of the past.

Summer boarders filled the place, amusements—sometimes of questionable nature—were in order every evening, and the two hotels greatly prospered, the Horse Head House holding its prestige of respectability.

Reuben Hilton had employed a young man to fill Will's place, and to all outward appearances the son was not greatly missed.

Will still remained with Deacon Barkmore.

His wages were paid over regularly to his father—in fact, the landlord had demanded it of the deacon, as another measure toward forcing Will's return; but the deacon provided Will with clothes besides.

He had found in Will a laborer worthy of his hire, and more. Never had he had a hand so faithful.

One day—it was then September—the deacon called on Hilton to pay him, as usual.

He had been prompt to the day in these settlements.

The amount he tendered this time was a little less than the usual ten dollars he had been paying, and Hilton quickly demanded: "How is this, Barkmore? I want ten dollars."

"Well, you cannot get it out of me this time," was the answer. "William came of age a few days ago, and I have paid him the difference. This winds up the matter 'twixt you and me."

The landlord flushed.

"Well, you are right," he said. "I did not think of that."

"And I want to say further that you have got a son to be proud of," the deacon added. "I couldn't love him more if he was my own boy."

"Proud of him!" cried Hilton, for the deacon had touched his sorest spot. "Proud of him, after the fool he has made of himself? I guess not! I hope he will come to his senses, some day."

"Well, you and I have different ways of looking at the same thing, Hilton," the deacon rejoined. "In my opinion he came to his senses last winter when he took the step he did. I say, he is a son to be proud of; and I hope you will come to own it."

The deacon took his receipt and went away, leaving the proprietor of the Horse Head House in a thoughtful mood.

Yes, Will was now of age.

On the morning of his birthday the deacon had asked him if he wanted to stay on, and Will had decided to stay.

He knew he could not find a better place at that kind of work, and as he had no trade he could not do much better at anything else. He would look around, but while he did so he would remain where he was.

So another bargain was struck.

One day, a short time after, when the deacon had been to town, he came out to the field where Will was at work, on his return.

"William," he said, "I have got a bit of bad news."

"What is it, Mr. Barkmore?" Will asked, his heart beating quick with dread. He thought immediately of father, mother, and sister.

"Why, Fred Wilson has given over;

he was drunk in town last night. He stouted it out well, and I really hoped he was going to stick to it, but I s'pose the temptation was too strong."

Hardly any news could have pained Will more than this.

"It will kill his mother," he said.

"Nigh about, I reckon," the deacon agreed. "What I was going to say, William, you had better see him as soon as you can. You can do more with him than anybody else I know of."

"I will see him this very night," Will declared.

"You need not wait," said the deacon; "take the pony and go right in this afternoon."

And so he did.

Reaching town, he drove in by the church and tied under the church shed, and it was only a short walk to the widow's cottage.

He knocked at the kitchen door, his usual way, and when Mrs. Wilson opened the door he saw at once that she had been weeping. She seemed to have aged five years since he saw her last, only a short time before.

"You have heard?" she said, simply.

"Yes; where is he?" Will asked.

"He is in the sitting-room. Go right in."

There was no need to question or explain; each understood.

Will entered the sitting-room immediately, where he found Fred on the lounge.

"Don't scold, Billy," the young man said. "I didn't mean to do it, but here I am. I tried hard, you know I tried hard, Billy."

"Yes, you tried hard, Fred, and there was just where you failed, too," said Will. "I am not here to scold you, but to have a little chat with you. How did it happen, anyhow?"

"Just explain what you mean by what you say first. What would you have me do, if not try?"

"It was all try, Fred, and not enough trust, in your case. You began by saying you would try. I made up my mind that I would do—God helping me, and he has helped me, he is helping me."

"Yes, but you have got more will—"

"No, for I passed that right over to him; my will is now his will; that is all there is of it."

"Well, it is all up with me. I wouldn't care, only for mother—"

"One of the greatest reasons why you should care, Fred. You can make her happy in her old days, or you can send her to an early grave."

Fred covered his face with his hands and sobbed.

"But what is a fellow to do?" he demanded. "Take away the hotels, and what is there in Silverdale? A fellow can't stay in the house all the time, anyhow I can't, and there is no other place to go to of an evening. If you want to see anybody, you have got to go to the hotels. All the young fellows are there. If you want to know anything, you have got to be out among folks a little. And that was just how it happened; I was down before I knew it."

"But there are the meetings, and the reading-circle, and—"

"Don't mention them, they are not to my taste. They are just right for a few who like them, but I am one of the many who want something different—and can't find it outside of the hotels. Not that I like the hotel, but that is the nearest to what I do like; a place where a fellow can feel at home, hear what is going on, and have a little company. But, if that was all. The hotel is a place for business, and if you don't patronize the bar you soon feel that you are not wanted—anyhow, you think it is so whether it is or not. I don't go to Wheeler's either; that isn't respectable—"

"That! for the respectability," cried Will, snapping his fingers. "One is no better than another, or if it is, the 'respectable' place is the worst because it is the most alluring. A curse upon them all!"

Fred had never heard him speak so vehemently.

"Well, you are right, I guess," he admitted. "But, there is the case, just as it stands, and here I am, downed."

"And the same One will pick you up again, Fred. But I am here on business, too—that is business of another sort. Mr. Barkmore has been talking about putting up a new wagon-house, and I want to take you out there to look at the job."

"I promised to go to a ball to-night—"

"Well, you were not quite yourself, then, and they can get along without you. Get yourself ready and come along with me; we'll go spearing to-night, up the creek, if you feel like stirring yourself."

That decided him, for spearing was his favorite sport, as Will knew; and while Fred was getting ready Will had a talk with Mrs. Wilson.

The result was, the deacon had his wagon-house begun a little earlier than he had intended, that was all; and Fred remained at his place all the time he was building it.

And the result was, again, that when he returned home he had made a new resolve, and was better fortified to carry it out than he had been to "try" to remain steadfast. He had tried doing, and had failed; this time he began aright by yielding. And instead of saying he would try, he adopted Will's motto; he would do, God helping him!

But, for the direct and immediate cause of his fall—that was something for thought. Will Hilton found it so. It came as proof of a theory he had been framing in his mind for a long time. His father's barroom was the instrument, in the hands of Satan, for the ruin not only of body, but for the destruction of soul as well; and yet it was a "respectable" place, and was pointed out as such. Will's ambition was to make it respectable indeed!

His opportunity came.

CHAPTER IX.

"The Blind Shall See."

It was the day after Thanksgiving.

A horseman came dashing up to Deacon Barkmore's place from the direction of the village.

"Where is Will Hilton?" he asked eagerly. "His father has been stricken with paralysis and they think he is dying. Mrs. Hilton wants Will to come as soon as he can get there."

Will was called, the news was broken to him, and the deacon bade him take a horse and make all the haste he could.

Will's face was pale, and he did not attempt to speak at first. It was all he could do to keep back the tears, for he loved his father. On the way to the village he learned the particulars.

Reaching home, he turned up the carriage-way, secured his horse, and entered the house by the same door by which he had left it months before.

His sister met him, and led the way to his father.

Reuben Hilton was in bed, and Mrs. Hilton was sitting by his bedside. The doctor had just taken leave.

Mary had explained the situation on the way upstairs; that their father was blind, had lost the use of one side, but could still hear and talk; that there was hope that he might recover.

Will kissed his mother, and at once took his father's hand and spoke to him.

"Is it you, William?" was feebly asked.

"Yes, father, it is I."

"And you have come to stay?—tell me that you have come to stay. I have hoped so long that you would come back. Your mother will need you now."

"No, I have not come to stay, father," Will answered. "I have come to see you."

"But you must stay," drawing him nearer. "Your absence has killed me, and it will kill your mother, too. Can you forgive me Will?" in a whisper.

"I have never held anything to forgive, father," in the same low tone. "You know what I told you that morning; I knew you were not yourself at the time; you did not intend the blows for me."

He lashed his father on the forehead.

"Yes, yes; I know you said so; but I could not forgive myself, and never can. I have cursed myself a thousand times for that blow, Will, and I had to hear you say again that you forgive it. And then you said something else, Will, something that has been burning my heart out of my breast every waking moment of my life since—Martha, are you there?"

"Yes, husband."

"Please go out, you and Mary; I must talk with William alone."

They left the room quietly, and as soon as the door had closed, Reuben Hilton drew his boy yet closer to his breast.

"I wanted to talk freely, Will," he said. "It was hard work to whisper. I cannot see you, but I can feel of your face. Ha! why was my hand directed to touch that?"

In passing his hand over his son's face, his fingers had come in contact with the scar on his cheek, where a slight lump could be felt.

"Do not think of it, father; that is of the past."

"God was merciful not to take my life till I had again received your forgiveness, Will. Do you think he can forgive—that he would forgive me? But there is that thing between me and him—that accursed thing!"

"What thing, father?"

"That thing you named that morning—my license."

"Well, that can be removed, father, and he is even more willing to forgive than you are to ask."

"I hope so. I have ordered the barroom closed, Will, and it shall never be opened again while I live. In health, I was too stubborn to yield, and I regard my affliction as my just punishment."

"If it will only prove a blessing, father."

"It will. As I was saying, those last words of yours have been ringing in my ears ever since you spoke them. Not a single waking moment have they been out of my mind, and only my foolish, stubborn pride has kept me from taking the decisive step. But, I must tell you my plans."

"What are they, father?"

"You will sell out the business, and with the proceeds buy a farm, where you can live nicely with your mother and Mary. The hotel will be yours to sell with your mother signing off her rights. I have otherwise provided for Mary—"

"Father, stop. The doctor says you may recover, and in that case—"

"If I do, it shall be sold anyhow. I have resolved never to sell another drop of liquor while I live."

"But, with the wealth gained with what you have sold you would retire in ease, and have me do so, while another hand takes hold here and carries on the same ev traffic—"

"True, true. I had not thought of that. God's curse is upon me, and there is no escape—"

"There is a way, father."

"What is it?"

"What has been a curse may be made to serve as a blessing. This devil's fort may be wrested from him and its guns turned upon himself. Father, dare you give the hotel into my hands, from this hour? you will do that, then I have come home to remain with you."

"But, what on earth can you do with it? It will not be worth the running without the bar."

Will, forthwith, revealed all that he had in mind; the theory that he had been framing for many a day. He believed that a temperance hotel could not only exist, but that it could be made to pay expenses and a little besides. He spoke of the need of the village of some popular resort, where the young men could assemble of an evening without harm to themselves; he cited the case of Fred Wilson as an instance. He talked for an hour or longer, and his argument prevailed.

When the word went forth that Will Hilton had come home to stay, there was excitement, and the old "I told you so!" was heard everywhere.

In the evening he rode back to Deacon Barkmore's, and told him of his plans for the future, and they were heartily approved. The deacon was sorry to part with him, declaring that he would never be able to fill his place, but bade him God speed.

On the following morning, as the barroom of the Horse Head House still remained closed, it was rumored that Reuben Hilton was dead.

The Perils of Ambition.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Jan. 12. Luke 2 : 52 ; Deut. 8 : 11-20.

PROSPERITY is a severe test of character. Adversity tries it, too, but not with the subtle and insidious power that prosperity applies. It is well that this fact should be recognized at the outset life, because the spirit of the age, and the principles of education instil ambition so strongly that the young are apt to be heedless and to regard prosperity as an unalloyed blessing. Ambition will have its place and regard the man who has it as dull, spiritless, or lazy. It is therefore important that young people should understand its perils.

One most important caution with respect to ambition is as to its object. There is need to take heed that the goal aimed at is worthy of the effort to attain it.

One of the saddest utterances in this world is that of an old man confessing that he has wasted his life. The Dead End apple is the bitterest of all fruit. To give time and labor and self-denial for some object, to win the battle and then find that the thing was not worth the effort, is heart-breaking. "I have succeeded, I have gained, I strove for it and it yields me no satisfaction;" that is a sorry end of life. Ecclesiastes utters some impressive warnings in his connection that every young man will do well to consider.

A second peril is that of sacrificing in the pursuit of worldly good, things that are too precious to be lost. There is no conceivable gain in the world that will compensate a man for the loss of character. The object can be attained only by lying or chicanery, the cost is too heavy. It is too high a price to give for wealth or position. Yet the temptation is often very severe. When the prize seems near, or when a foothold on the ladder long sought, is just within reach and the only obstacle is some fact or truth, the whisper is sure to come that it is best to suppress it, to take the prize and not be squeamish. The struggle is often hard, but he is the strong, wise man who resists and who will not sully his soul with a lie to win the highest prize on earth. The sacrifice of spiritual health is another sacrifice too heavy to be made. If any pursuit becomes so engrossing that it absorbs all a man's time, leaving no space for prayer or for Bible study, it is costing too much. There is peril in it. No man can afford to lose his soul even to gain the whole world.

Then there is peril of pride and arrogance. An achievement which places a man ahead of others, stimulates exalted ideas of his own powers. He has succeeded where others have failed and he thinks of his success with self-complacency. He becomes haughty, despises his competitors and plumes himself on his superiority. The Old Testament passage, appointed for the Topic, gives emphatic warning of this.

Another peril is that of a hard and callous spirit. Wealth and power are trusts. He who has them is a steward. He is bound by the laws of humanity to use them for the benefit of his fellow-man. The selfishness that would use them to impoverish others, is the most despicable of all the products of worldly success.

These are only a few of the perils that beset the path of worldly success. Blessed is the man who seeks first the kingdom of God, and makes that his supreme concern to which "other things" may be added.

LOVED BY THEE.

THERE'S a light upon my road,
 Light more perfect than the day!
 Like to Christian, I can say:
 "I am loved by thee, O God!"
 Where the Master's feet have trod
 Flow'rs a ten-fold sweetness yield.
 Praise be thine! Thou has revealed That I'm loved by thee, O God!
 Like the swallow's homeward flight
 Over lakelet, moor, and lea,
 Be my soul's, when it to thee
 Wings its passage through the night!

Loved by thee, thou new-born Son!
 Loved by thee, whom angels praise!
 Loved by thee, Ancient of Days!
 Loved by thee, thou Three in One!
 Prince of Bethlehem, thine abode
 Once was but a cattle stall;
 Now we "crown thee Lord of all,"
 For thy love leads us to God!
 Bright the city of our Rest Gleams the sunset hills above!
 "Jesus loves me. God is love."
 Loved by thee! yea, I am blest!

The Lord's Coming.

Its Prominence in the Scriptures and its Pertinence to Christian Life.

BY DR. GEO. F. PENTECOST.

THE fact of the coming of the Lord being so obvious on almost every page of the Scripture has compelled those expositors who have denied his pre-millennial coming in glory, to explain the hundreds of texts which refer to it to mean what they evidently cannot mean.

It must be borne in mind that his coming is not several different events. It is held forth in the Scriptures as one great event, toward which all other events are converging. It is the coming event in history, just as his first coming was the one specific great event toward which all eyes were turned under the former dispensation.

The outpouring of the Holy Ghost on the Day of Pentecost was not the second coming of Christ, as some have supposed and taught, for the reason that after this, most of the New Testament promises were given including the great prophecy of his coming in Revelation.

It is not conversion. For the reason that this is not one event, but a common, everyday occurrence the world over wherever the Gospel is preached, and in no wise synchronises with the great events which are to accompany the "Coming of the Lord."

It is not death. This is a favorite and popular explanation of that great warning text: "For in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh." But every suggestion in connection with the coming of Christ is of life and not death. "When he who is our life shall appear, we shall also appear with him in glory." Besides, his coming is to be the signal of the resurrection of the sleeping just, and not the burial of his saints.

It was not the destruction of Jerusalem. Besides many other reasons which render such an exposition impossible of adjustment with this coming event, the promise of his coming, and the warning concerning it continued long after that event.

It is not to be looked for in the world's conversion. Because that is not an event which could happen "as a thief in the night." Besides one of the synchronizing events in connection with the coming is the destruction of "them who have not obeyed the Gospel."

There can be no doubt but that the promise of his coming conveys and contains the second personal and visible bodily appearance of the Lord Jesus on the earth again, for so the promises plainly read. A good canon for the understanding of those Scriptures that point to our Lord's second coming is to be found in this fact: All those prophecies which pointed to his first advent were fulfilled literally, and not figuratively, even to the details of the parting of his garments by lots cast by those who crucified him. Why not expect the same literalness in connection with his second coming?

"This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Nothing could be more explicit and simple than this statement, and no ingenuity can make it mean that his coming is to be understood in a figurative sense. We are told "every eye shall see him, and they, also, that pierced him." This is of a great visible event, apparent to the whole world. His appearance will be an astonishment for with him in the mid-heavens will appear the gathered Church, out of all the nations.

THE BOOK SHELF

An Indian Child-Waif.*

YOUNG INDIAN GIRL IN NATIVE DRESS.
(By per A. S. S. Union.)

DR. HOLLEY had passed a Comanche camp, and was two or three hundred yards beyond it, when his ear became conscious of a faint sound like the feeble wail of a child. He at once looked about him, but could see nothing. The grass was not very tall about this portion of the prairie, so he could see well in every direction. Again he heard the faint sound, and was not quite sure if it was an infant's cry. Directly in front of him was a slight depression in the earth, which was almost bare of verdure. He recognized at once that it was a dry water hole. Very soon when the spring rains would begin to come in earnest, it would fill up and the cattle would gather here to drink. But now it was perfectly dry and there was a collection of sand at the bottom. A third time the cry was repeated, and the Doctor distinguished plainly now that it proceeded directly from this water hole. He took a few steps forward, descended to the bottom, and then stooped down, listening intently. There was no further noise.

The Doctor, thinking that he had assuredly been mistaken in the location of the sound, was on the point of rising, when a slight disturbance of the sand to the right of him attracted his attention. He at once made his way to the place, crawling on his hands and knees.

"I think I know what it is now!" he said aloud, as he began rapidly, but carefully to scoop up the sand with both hands. As he did so the stir became more and more perceptible. In a few seconds, he had removed the sand to the depth of about a foot and a half, and there, in full view, was the tiny body of a baby wrapped in an old piece of blanket. Though it had given utterance to such a distinct wail several moments before, the baby was now very nearly suffocated from the pressure of the sand, and the Doctor had all he could do to revive it.

"This is the work of some Comanche mother," said he, as he sought vigorously to bring back life to the baby. "The poor woman has given birth to twins, and following the promptings of her mother-nature she has sought to put one of the way in order to save the other."

Among the Comanches the terrible custom of destroying twins is still prevalent, for it thought to be animal-like and unnatural to give birth to them. If the father is absent and the mother does not herself destroy them, then the father, on his return, will dash their brains out before her, or throw them as he would blind puppies into the river, never minding how piteously the mother may plead. Sometimes, when twins are born in the absence of the father, the mother will put one of them out of the way herself in order to save the other. More than one child has thus been unearthed by a kindly rescuing hand from the pit of sand where the mother had buried it. There is now among the Apaches, near to the Agency of Anadarko, a little Comanche girl of thirteen years who has been thus rescued. In a short while, the Doctor had so restored the baby that it could feebly open its eyes. Then he unbuttoned his coat, and throwing it off, took from beneath his warm flannel vest, and wrapped the little creature snugly therein. This done, he replaced his coat, and, sitting down upon the sand, took the tiny bundle in his arms, and gravely contemplated it.

To the right of the Agent's house, and only about a fourth of a mile away, there was a cluster of three or four teepees, much whiter and nicer looking than the majority of those that dotted the plains. In the largest tepee dwelt a Kiowan chieftain, Tohausin, with Unkama his wife, and three or four squaws who were either his nieces or hers. Unkama and Tohausin had no children of their own. Both their little ones had died years before. They loved children dearly, especially Unkama, and thus it was that the two papooses in their tepee had just the nicest time in the world. Dr. Holley, with his strange burden carefully concealed in his arms, skirted

INDIAN PAPOOSE IN HANGING CRADLE.

around the Agent's house and made his way direct to the tepee of Unkama. An Indian's wigwam has neither bell nor knocker. Literally, he keeps open house and is always prepared to see a visitor. So, without ceremony, Dr. Holley lifted the canvass curtain falling over the entrance, and stepped within the tepee; only his head went in first and then his feet followed. "Greeting to you, my friends," he said in Kiowan the moment he was inside.

As he spoke, he opened his coat and there, lying upon his broad chest, snugly wrapped in the folds of his vest and muffler, was the little Indian baby sound asleep.

Unkama threw the palms of her hands together and then outward in an expression of surprise. Then she moved nearer and held out her arms for the baby. The other Indian women, even more overcome with surprise, crowded around, squatting upon the ground at the Doctor's feet, each one gesticulating after her fashion, and murmuring words of astonishment. The noise aroused the baby and it began to cry lustily.

"It will be no trouble," said Unkama, "The little one is welcome. Tagano has a young papoose and can care for this one, too. Besides, I'd do this and much more for your sake," and he dark eyes were fixed gratefully upon his face.

So the little Matouchon, the abandoned waif found in the sand, the bud so mercilessly cast from the parent stem and left to perish, grew day by day into a fat, saucy and good-humored baby, winning her way to all hearts, but especially to that of Unkama, her adopted mother.

Christianity in the Family.*

PURITY and home, both words without meaning outside of Christian lands, are respectively the root and flower of the family, which is the primary social group, in the order both of time and importance. It is the fault of much current sociological discussion, as of current legislation, that it makes more of property than of purity, more of money than of morals, and so assumes that the shop rather than the home is the sociological point of departure, and that larger having rather than nobler being is the sociological end. It degrades sociology to make it a mere extension of economics.

But surely there is no need to prove that normal society is an association of families. The opening chapters of Genesis teach not only monotheism, but monogamy. Society is there shown to have originated in a holy family. Historically, nations are but families expanded to tribes, headed by a father-king. One reason why our modern cities are so abnormal morally is that they are abnormal socially, being largely composed of boarders, the fragments of broken families. Rev. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst, the most illustrious of municipal reformers, declares that "the sorest spot in our municipal condition—in national also—is the decadence of the home idea." The home has very largely given place to the boarding-house, especially in the case of the young men, who so madly rush to the cities at the very age of greatest moral peril. This causes the break up, if not the break down, of family life. It is hardly less than a wrong to society when a family takes to boarding.

Society being composed of families, can be no better than its families. A corrupt family is a poisoned drop of society's life blood. "Bad homes and heredity," if not, as claimed by Dr. S. W. Dike, "the most potent single cause of crime," constitute at least one of the most potent. The perils of the home are the most serious, because the most fundamental perils of society. The betterment of the homes is the most radical method of improving society.

Christian sociology, in discussing the family, first of all is bound to defend its Christian foundation, monogamy, against both Mormonism and unscriptural divorces, that is, against both contemporaneous and "consecutive polygamy." It is a curious fact that in 1877 these two evils were exhibited side by side in Utah, where there were among "the Gentiles" about half as many divorces as marriages during that year.

Some have cited against Christianity the polygamy of Old Testament believers. These accusers should consider, on the other hand, that God's original Edenic plan was monogamy; and that polygamy was never divinely sanctioned; and that Christ brought to men the strictest of monogamous laws. Especially is it important to note in this connection that wherever the Bible prevails, polygamy and impurity are both outlawed, while they are not so outlawed in any pagan or heathen code of morals. Stealing and killing are condemned in all codes. Natural morality forbids both. Purity (including monogamy) and Sabbath-keeping are the two distinctive features of Christian morality. In nothing is the superiority of Christianity more marked than in matters pertaining to women and children, and so to the problem of the family.

Colonel Robert Ingersoll, in his most popular lecture, attempts to show that "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," so far as secured, is an anti-Christian or at least a non-Christian achievement. It is only necessary to point in reply to the fact that the oldest and best of non-Christian civilizations, those that have tried long and thoroughly the agnostic ethical culture of Confucius and Buddha, have wholly failed, except as recently influenced by Christianity, to develop any "liberty" even for man, much less for woman or child. The World's Parliament of Religions—on the holding of which I raise no question—has shown us some of the pretty savings of heathen religions, a few gems gathered out of much mire; but no educated man should forget, as the sufficient refutation of all their claims to rank with Christianity, that all these heathen religions not merely tolerate but consecrate impurity. None of them can stand the test, "How do you treat woman?" What we hide on back streets as a vice, they parade in their temples as virtue.

As to Mormonism, although the pretended "revelation" against polygamy which was promulgated by the Mormon chief was undoubtedly a trick to secure Statehood for Utah and so protection for polygamy, the anti-Mormon party has dissolved in the conviction that such an act can never be recalled.

A Northern New England Home.

THE accompanying picture was taken by a missionary of the American Sunday School Union in northern New England, not far from the Canada line. We expect to see such homes on the frontier, but must not be surprised that they occur occasionally in New England. Of course, they are not to be understood as characteristic of New England life, and yet it is true that they are to be found more frequently than is imagined. Such homes are usually in the outlying rural districts, off from the main roads, in the back woods, and therefore where travel seldom goes.

The missionary who took this picture brew newspapers, respectively entitled the "Hoar" (Light), "Hacharazeleth" (the Flower), and "Jeruscholajim."

A Papal Dilemma.

A singular coincidence, almost ludicrous in its inconsistency is noted in the recent issue of the "Index Expurgatorius"—the book which notifies the members of the Roman Catholic Church what books they should not read. One of the books on the list of proscribed volumes is entitled "Del Sangue Sacratissimo di Maria," and it was written by no less a person than the present Pope. It was published three years before the elevation of Leo XIII. to the Chair of St. Peter, and was condemned at the time. Once a book is on the Index, there it must remain, for the Church that placed it there is infallible.

that was just after a storm, in which our ship had been badly knocked about. Most of our provisions were spoiled by sea-water, and the crew, angry and ill, suddenly mutinied, and came forward in a menacing way, demanding of the captain that he put about and run for the nearest port. The captain refused, as in that heavy sea it would have been the act of a madman. At last, when he saw words were unavailing, and only making the men more dangerous, he doffed his oilskin hat, and, standing bare-headed in the driving rain, he prayed that God might guide his heart and the hearts of all the crew aright in this matter. When the prayer was over, the men, who had also uncovered, filed away without a word, prepared to leave everything to him who holds the sea in the hollow of his hand."

Rich and Poor Marriages.

Saddest of all domestic unions are those marriages wherein worldly obstacles bar the way to real happiness. Where both have health and strength, and "where love is," there should be ample opportunity for mutual sacrifices. Who has not seen the happiness that comes from the need of these sacrifices, the joy of little successes achieved together, the gradual building of a home? The happiest marriages, surely, are those which begin in this way, and not those which are postponed till the freshness of youth is passed—marriages which, in order to have something to live upon, forego the actual joy of living. The poet of the people, Riley, touched a chord well-nigh universal when he sang:

Let's go-a-visitin' back to Grigsby's Station,
There where we used to be so happy and so poor.

Two Cent Testament.

Mr. William Noble, whose temperance work is well known in this country has made an experiment in Shoreditch and Whitechapel, London, which seems to be worthy of imitation; he gave an address or a recitation on Saturday nights, and then offered the penny New Testament for sale; as many as thirteen hundred were sold one night in the heart of Whitechapel. The people in that district which is notoriously the poorest in London, could not spare two cents without feeling the pinch of self-denial, but they would not let the chance of getting a New Testament escape them.

Prayer in a Crisis.

At an evangelistic meeting an old sea-captain rose and said: "I can add my testimony to that of the other speaker as to the value of religion. It is from a different standpoint. They are business and professional men while all my life has been spent at sea, but my experience has been the same as theirs. My name is Hunt and I have been captain of a merchant vessel for the last twenty years. Before I got to be skipper it was my lot to sail under officers of all kinds, godly and ungodly. In every case I have found that the Christian skipper possesses a greater grip over his men, and most certainly commands a deeper respect from his officers. In time of danger the Christian sailor is, in nearly all cases, the cooler and braver man. I have only seen one mutiny on board ship, and

A Noble Life Ended.

Rev. Josiah Tyler, For Forty Years a Missionary in Africa, Passed to His Reward.

ONE of the most remarkable missionary careers known to the present generation has just closed in the death, last week, of Rev. Josiah Tyler, who for forty years had labored for Christ among the native tribes of South Africa. Mr. Tyler was the son of a Connecticut clergyman, was led in early life to look toward Africa as his future field of labor. He belonged to a missionary society at East Windsor Hill, Conn., the members of which agreed to examine carefully the aims of foreign missions, confer with each other, and ask the Lord to direct them as to their future fields of labor. Of their number, one went to Syria, another to Salonica, and three others, including Mr. Tyler, to South Africa. Before reaching this decision he had been offered a pastorate in Central Massachusetts, but declined, although the offer was quite a tempting one for a young preacher. In 1842, with his young bride to whom he had been married only a few weeks, he set sail for Cape Town and soon thereafter reached Natal, where for the next forty years he labored earnestly and successfully for the salvation of souls. His work was conducted under the auspices of the American Board. A few years ago, he was afflicted by ill-health to relinquish the mission field. Returning to the United States, he issued the closing years of his life in writing the record of his labors in the "Dark Continent," and in 1891 his book, "Forty Years Among the Zulus," appeared. It is most interesting and instructive record of Christian activity and pioneer missionary experience, and was fully noticed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the time of its appearance. On several occasions the leaders of this journal have been favored with contributions from Dr. Tyler's descriptive pen. He was a graceful writer and an authority not only on all matters relating to missionary work in Natal, but on the history, languages, legends and folk-lore of the African tribes as well. In 1871, after twenty-two years continuous labor at Esidumbini, Mr. and Mrs. Tyler paid a brief visit to their native land. Six children had been born to them. A native pastor was placed in charge of the little church of thirty members that they had gathered at Esidumbini, near Durban. After a short season they returned to Africa. Their Esidumbini charge had prospered so well under the native teacher, that, at the request of the Board of Missions, Mr. Tyler consented to leave in his care, to open up new ground at another place. The new station was at Mzunduzi, fifteen miles away, and there the missionaries began again their teaching and preaching. After some sixteen years there, Mr. Tyler suffered the great affliction of his life in the death of his beloved wife. He struggled on alone for two years, and then turned his face homeward. He passed away in North Carolina last week at the ripe age of seventy-two years.

Building an African Church.

From Mr. Randall, who is one of the missionaries in connection with the Institute conducted by Dr. Grattan Guinness, comes the following incident of church building in Africa: "From the first the Ngonde people have shown a great desire to have the Gospel preached to them, and I suggested that they should build themselves a chapel for the worship of God. They took up the idea warmly, and the next day about twenty-four volunteers came and asked that their names might be written down to help in the work. When I had finished the list, off they went to the forest to get posts, singing and shouting. About 11 A. M. they returned, and worked so well that before sunset all the posts were up. I cannot attempt to give details of each day's work, but I endeavored to encourage them as much as possible, going with them one day to get bamboos, and another day to bring the mpete palm branches for thatching. About fifty young men altogether took part in the work, besides women and children, and each day as we finished there was general rejoicing. Of course, there were hindrances. There was as usual in Africa the question of wages. At the outset I was asked whether I would pay for the work. 'No,' I said, 'it is your chapel; if you don't want it, don't build.' Upon this, some drew back and would work no more, but the others took the greater pleasure in their labor. Then some of the lazy chiefs, who do nothing but lie about all day, laughed at the young men for building God's house and not making the white man pay them; and a few could not stand the jeers of their chief, but the majority did not care. To-morrow, Bro. Hayes and I are going over to finish off the seats, and on Saturday, Munro, Morrey, James and Wilson will join us for the opening services."

PALESTINE WILD FLOWERS.

Mr. T. P. Williams, Washington, D. C., sends these eulogistic verses on the Palestine Floral Album which he received as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD premium:

The Rose of Sharon is the rose of love;
Its glory is in Paradise above.
All flowers must bow to this, their glorious king;
Its praise, will poets, saints and angels sing.
It shows "the standard red" of Calvary!
And yields perfumes of love to you and me.
Consider now "the lilies of the field."
They never toil and neither do they spin.
Yet, Solomon, adorn'd with robes, and shield
Of gold and gems and ornaments, to win
Applause and cheers, was ne'er array'd like these!
Sweet lilies! heavens of butterflies and bees.
Behold the "Passion Everlasting" flower;
And golden "Mustard," showing seeds of power.
See "Golden Clover" and bright "Pheasant's eye!"
See "Cyclamen" and dear "Red Lentil" high
In sight. Behold the "Grass," the fluffy "Flax,"
And "Hyssop" giving air an income tax.
"Maiden-hair-fern," so delicate and green!
Admire the tender, healthy, flowery "Bean."
How tiny, silky, soft, is that "Puff Ball!"
Deserving praise, though wild and weak, and small!
Oh! find the "Cummin" and its great renown;
And last, but not least—the floral "Crown."

From Plough to Pulpit.

The Career of a Poor Negro Boy who Became an Evangelist.

IN midsummer, twenty-four years ago, a negro farmer and his wife, who occupied a humble dwelling at McGehee's Switch,

J. H. McGEHEE, Evangelist.

Ala., were gladdened by the birth of a son. The boy was named James Hinkle McGehee. His parents, David and Alice McGehee, were simple, honest people, the mother being a devout Christian. The boy received a common school education such as falls to the lot of country lads usually, but from his eighth year he developed a passion for home study and a wonderful faculty of acquiring languages. Soon he was proficient in French, Latin, German, and even Greek, and his studies were as varied as his limited opportunities afforded. In his eighteenth year he was converted and connected himself with the A. M. E. Zion Church. Soon afterward he felt himself divinely called to the work of the Gospel and two years later received a license to preach. He had a natural eloquence and soon became well-known throughout a wide section. The pastors found him useful and he filled many of the leading pulpits. While still only a local preacher, he joined the A. M. E. Church at Montgomery in 1883, Rev. Wm. Bradwell, pastor. For eight years he served as pastor and was sent to Girard, Ala., in 1888. He afterwards filled several Columbus, Ga., pulpits, viz.: St. James, St. John, St. Marks, and others.

His fame as orator and preacher began to extend, and his labors as a revivalist were greatly blessed. He has preached in all the leading cities of Alabama. In 1887, he held a revival at Richmond, Ala., being associated with Rev. S. W. Shields. Several hundred persons were added to the A. M. E. Church at that time. In 1888, he conducted a protracted revival and many were brought into church membership.

Mr. McGehee has also conducted successful revivals at Salem Camp-meeting, Flat Rock, Lewisville Camp-meeting, Wilamas, Ridge Camp-meeting, and along the Gulf of Mexico. He has delivered the Word in court-houses, halls, on platforms, and in the open air, and at all times his labors have been rendered effective in Gospel work. Thus, a poor farmer boy has, under Divine Providence, been made instrumental in winning many souls.

CONSUMPTION.

A scientific discussion of this dread disease, its cause, treatment and cure, by Dr. Robert Hunter, the father of inhalation and most eminent lung specialist of the day. After a period of research extending over half a century, Dr. Hunter explains his perfected discovery of a specific remedy for consumption, and proves its success not only scientifically but through the grateful testimonials of his patients. Dr. Hunter was for forty years the sole advocate of the germ theory of consumption which is now accepted by the medical profession throughout the world as the only correct theory—thus establishing beyond doubt his superior knowledge of this disease. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can obtain Dr. Hunter's book explaining his treatment without charge by addressing him at his residence, 117 West Forty-fifth street, New York.

Your invaluable remedy, Hyomei, has cured me of Catarrh that had defied the power of many so-called cures. I could not be without Hyomei and my Pocket Inhaler on any consideration. I am subject to colds, and I find that Hyomei breaks them up at once. It seems to penetrate the affected part like magic. I believe it to be the greatest preventive of pneumonia ever discovered. Hyomei has also cured a friend, Miss Annie Murphy, of a most chronic case of Asthma. For three weeks she has sat in her chair day and night. She retired to her bed the evening of the day she began using Hyomei, and slept naturally. She has had no return of Asthma since using Hyomei last spring.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable anti-septic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. Consultation and trial free at my office.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

THE SEAL IS SET.

Text: Luke 15: 22: "Put a ring on his hand."

WILL not rehearse the familiar story of the fast young man of the parable. You know what a splendid home he left. You know what a hard time he had. And you remember how after that season of vagabondage and prodigality he resolved to go and weep out his sorrows on the bosom of parental forgiveness. Well, there is great excitement one day in front of the door of the old farm-house. The servants come rushing up and say: "What's the matter? What is the matter?" But before they quite arrive, the old man cries out: "Put a ring on his hand." What a seeming absurdity! What can such a wretched mendicant as this fellow that is tramping on toward the house want with a ring? Oh, he is the prodigal son. No more tending of the swine-trough. No more longing for the pods of the carob-tree. No more blistered feet. Off with the rags! On with the robe! Out with the ring! Even so does God receive every one of us when we come back. There are gold rings, and pearl rings, and emerald rings, and diamond rings; but the richest ring that ever flashed on the vision is that which our Father puts upon a forgiven soul.

I know that the impression is abroad among some people that religion beleans and belittles a man; that it takes all the sparkle out of his soul; that he has to exchange a roistering independence for an ecclesiastical strait-jacket. Not so. When a man becomes a Christian, he does not go down, he starts upward. Religion multiplies one by ten thousand. Nay, the multiplier is in infinity. It is not a bletting out—it is a polishing, it is an arborescence, it is an efflorescence, it is an irradiation. When a man comes into the kingdom of God he is not sent into a menial service, but the Lord God Almighty from the palaces of heaven calls upon the messenger angels that wait upon the throne to fly and "put a ring on his hand." In Christ are the largest liberty, and brightest joy, and highest honor, and richest adornment. "Put a ring on his hand."

I remark, in the first place, that when Christ receives a soul into his love, he puts upon him the ring of adoption. While in my church in Philadelphia, there came the representative of the Howard Mission of New York. He brought with him eight or ten children of the street that he had picked up, and he was trying to find for them Christian homes; and as the little ones stood on the pulpit and sang, our hearts melted within us. At the close of the services a great-hearted wealthy man came up and said, "I'll take this little fellow, and I'll adopt her as one of my own children;" and he took her by the hand, lifted her into his carriage, and went away.

The next day, when we were in the church gathering in charity for the poor of New York, this little child came back with a bundle under her arm, and she said, "I'm the same old dear, perhaps some of the poor folks would like to have it," while she herself was in bright and beautiful array, and those who more immediately examined her said she had a ring on her hand. It was a ring of adoption.

There are a great many persons who pride themselves on their ancestry, and they glory over the royal blood that pours through their arteries. In their line there was a lord, or a duke, or a prime minister, or a king. But when the Lord, our Father, puts upon us the ring of his adoption, we become the children of the Ruler of all nations. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." It matters not how poor our garments may be in this world, or how scant our bread, or how mean the hut we live in, if we have that ring of Christ's adoption upon our hand we are assured of eternal defenses.

Adopted! Why, then, we are brothers and sisters to all the good of earth and heaven. We have the family name, the family dress, the family keys, the family wardrobe. The Father looks after us, robes us, defends us, blesses us. We have royal blood in our veins, and there are crowns in our line. If we are his children, then princes and princesses. It is only a question of time when we get our coronet. Adopted! Then we have the family secrets. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." Adopted! Then we have the family inheritance, and in the day when our Father shall divide the riches of heaven we shall take our share of the mansions and palaces and temples. Henceforth let us boast no more of an earthly ancestry. The insignia of eternal glory is our coat-of-arms. This ring of adoption puts upon us all honor and all privilege. Now we can take the words of Charles Wesley, that prince of hymn-makers, and sing:

Come, let us join our friends above,
Who have obtained the prize,
And on through waves of love
To glory's triumph rise.
For all the saints, from trial ring
With theirs to glory go,
For all the servants of our King
In heaven and earth, are one.

I have been told that when any of the members of any of the great secret societies of this country are in a distant city and are in any kind of trouble, and are set upon by enemies, they have only to give a certain signal and the members of that organization will flock around for defense. And when any man belongs to this great Christian brotherhood, if he gets in trouble, in trial, in persecution, in temptation, he has only to show this ring of Christ's adoption, and all the armed cohorts of heaven will come to his rescue.

Still further, when Christ takes a soul into his love he puts upon it a marriage-ring. Now, that is not a whim of mine: (Hosea 2: 19). "I will betroth thee unto me forever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercies." At the wedding-altar the bride-groom puts a ring upon the hand of the bride, signifying love and faithfulness. Trouble may come upon the household, and the carpets may go, the pictures may go, the piano may go, everything else may go—the last thing that goes is that marriage-ring, for it is considered sacred. In the burial hour it is withdrawn from the hand and kept in a casket, and sometimes the box is opened on an anniversary day, and as you look at that ring you see under its arch a long procession of precious memories. Within the golden circle of that ring there is room for a thousand sweet recollections to revolve, and you think of the great contrast between the hour when, at the close of the "Wedding March," under the flashing lights and amid the aroma of orange-blossoms, you set that ring on the round finger of the plump hand, and that hour when, at the close of the exhaustive watching, when you knew that the soul had fled, you took from the hand, which gave back no responsive clasp, from that emaciated finger, the ring that she had worn so long and worn so well.

On some anniversary day you take up that ring, and you polish it until all the old lustre comes back, and you can see in it the flash of eyes that long ago ceased to weep. Oh, it is not an unmeaning thing when I tell you that when Christ receives a soul into his keeping he puts on it a marriage-ring. He endows you from that moment with all his wealth. You are one—Christ and the soul—one in sympathy, one in affection, one in hope.

There is no power on earth or hell to effect a divorce after Christ and the soul are united. Other kings have turned out their companions when they got weary of them, and sent them adrift from the palace gate. Ahasuerus banished Vashti; Napoleon forsook Josephine; but Christ is the husband that is true forever. Having loved you once, he loves you without change to the end.

Did they not try to divorce Margaret, the Scotch girl, from Jesus? They said: "You must give up your religion." She said: "I can't give up my religion." And so they took her down to the beach of the sea, and they drove in a stake at low-water mark, and they fastened her to it, expecting that as the tide came up her faith would fail. The tide began to rise, and came up higher and higher, and to the girdle, and to the lip, and in the last moment, just as the wave was washing her soul into glory, she shouted the praises of Jesus.

Oh, no, you cannot separate a soul from Christ! It is an everlasting marriage. Battle and storm and darkness cannot do it. Is it too much exultation for a man, who is but dust and ashes like myself, to cry out this moment: "I am persuaded that neither height, nor depth, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor any other creature shall separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus my Lord?" Glory be to God that when Christ and the soul are married they are bound by a chain—a golden chain—if I might so describe it—a chain with one link, and that one link the golden ring of God's everlasting love.

I go a step further, and tell you that when Christ receives a soul into his love he puts on him the ring of festivity. You know that it has been the custom in all ages to bestow rings on very happy occasions. There is nothing more appropriate for a birthday gift than a ring. You delight to bestow such a gift upon your children at such a time. It means joy, hilarity, festivity. Well, when this old man of the text wanted to tell how glad he was that his boy had got back, he expressed it in this way. Actually, before he ordered sandals to be put on his bare feet; before he ordered the fatted calf to be killed to appease the boy's hunger, he commanded: "Put a ring on his hand."

Oh, it is a merry time when Christ and the soul are united! Joy of forgiveness! What a splendid thing it is to feel that all is right between God and myself. What a glorious thing it is to have God just take up all the sins of my life and put them in one bundle, and then fling them into the depths of the sea, never to rise again, never to be talked of again. Pollution all gone, Darkness all illumined. God reconciled. The prodigal home. "Put a ring on his hand."

Every day I find happy Christian people. I find some of them with no second coat, some of them in huts and tenement houses, not one earthly comfort afforded them; and yet they are as happy as happy can be. They sing "Rock of Ages" as no other people in the world sing it. They never wore any jewelry in their life but one gold ring, and that was the ring of God's undying affection. Oh, how happy religion makes us! Did it make you gloomy and sad? Did you go with your head cast down? I do not think you got religion, my brother. That is not the effect of religion. True religion is a joy. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

Why, religion lightens all our burdens. It smooths all our way. It interprets all our sorrows. It changes the jar of earthly discord for the peal of festal bells. In front of the flaming furnace of trial it sets the forge on which sceptres are hammered out. Would you not like this hour to come up from the swine-feeding and try this religion? All the joys of heaven would come out and meet you, and God would cry from the throne: "Put a ring on his hand."

You are not happy. I see it. There is no peace, and sometimes you laugh when you feel a great deal more like crying. The world is a cheat. It first wears you down with its follies, then it kicks you out into darkness. It comes back from the massacre of a million souls to attempt the destruction of your soul to-day. No peace out of God, but here is the fountain that can slake the thirst. Here is the harbor where you can drop safe anchorage.

Would you not like, I ask you—not perfunctorily, but as one brother might talk to another—would you not like to have a pillow of rest to put your head on? And would you not like, when you retire at night, to feel that all is well, whether you wake up to-morrow morning at six o'clock, or sleep the sleep that knows no waking? Would you not like to exchange this awful uncertainty about the future for a glorious assurance of heaven? Accept of the Lord Jesus to-day, and all is well. If on your way home some peril should cross the street and dash your life out, it would not hurt you. You would rise up immediately. You would stand in the celestial streets. You would be amid the great throng that forever worship and are forever happy. If this night some sudden disease should come upon you, it would not frighten you. If you knew you were going you could give a calm farewell to your beautiful home on earth, and know that you are going right into the companionship of those who have already got beyond the toiling and the weeping.

You feel on Saturday night different from the way you feel any other night of the week. You come home from the bank or the store, or the office, and you say: "Well, now my week's work is done, and to-morrow is Sunday." It is a pleasant thought. There is refreshment and reconstruction in the very idea. Oh, how pleasant it will be, if, when we get through the day of our life, and we go and lie down in our bed of dust, we can realize: "Well, now the work is all done, and to-morrow is Sunday—an everlasting Sunday."

Oh, when, thou city of my God,
Shall I thy courts ascend?
Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths have no end.

There are people in this house to-day who are very near the eternal world. I you are Christians, I bid you be of good cheer. Bear with you our congratulation to the bright city. Aged men, who will soon be gone, take with you our love for our kindred in the better land, and when you see them, tell them that we are soon coming. Only a few more sermons to preach and hear. Only a few more heart aches. Only a few more toils. Only more tears. Only a few more part-ings. And then—what an entrancing spectacle will open before us!

Beautiful heaven, where all is light,
 Beautiful angels, clothed in white,
 Beautiful strains that never tire,
 Beautiful harps through all the choir;
 There shall I join the chorus sweet,
 Worshipping at the Saviour's feet.

And so I approach you now with a general invitation, not picking out here and there a man, or here and there a woman, here and there a child; but giving you an unlimited invitation, saying: "Come, for all things are now ready." We invite you to the warm heart of Christ, and the closure of the Christian Church. I know of no greater many think that the church does not amount to much—that it is obsolete; that it did its work and is gone now, so far as all usefulness is concerned.
 It is the happiest place I have ever been except my own home.

I know there are some people who say they are Christians who seem to get along without any help from others, and who cultivate solitary piety. They do not want any ordinances. I do not belong to that class. I cannot get along without them.
 There are so many things in this world that take my attention from God, and Christ, and heaven, that I want all the helps of all the symbols and of all the Christian associations; and I want around about me a solid phalanx of men who love God and keep his commandments. Are there any here who would like to enter into that association? Then by a simple, child-like faith, apply for admission into the visible church, and you will be received.
 No questions asked about your past history or present surroundings. Only one question—do you love Jesus?

Baptism does not amount to anything, it is a great many people, but the Lord Jesus has declared, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," putting baptism and faith side by side. And an apostle declares, "Repent and be baptized, every one of you." I do not stickle for any particular mode of baptism, but I put great emphasis on the fact that you ought to be baptized. Yet no more emphasis than the Lord Jesus Christ, the Great Head of the church, puts upon it.

Some of you have been thinking on this subject year after year. You have found out that this world is a poor portion. You want to be Christians. You have come almost into the kingdom of God; but there you stop, forgetful of the fact that to be almost saved is not to be saved at all. Oh, my brother, after having come so near to the door of mercy, if you turn back, you will never come at all. After all you have heard of the goodness of God, if you turn away and die, it will not be because you did not have a good offer.

God's spirit will not always strive
 With hardened, self-destroying man;
 Ye who persist his love to grieve
 May never hear his voice again.

May God Almighty this hour move upon your soul and bring you back from the deserts of the wilderness to the Father's house, and set you at the banquet, and put a ring on your hand."

Gospel Work in New Mexico.

Writing from Dulce, N. Mex., Miss Maria Clegg, a missionary of the M. E.
 Church, and a reader of this journal, says:
 "I have been here since 1888. This year we have built a chapel with rooms over it for students who board themselves. The lower part is to be used for chapel and school. We also have taken children into our Mission Home, trusting the Lord for support. We have Mexicans, Apaches and Americans. Here any one can be prepared for college. God has wonderfully blessed his work. Miss Moore and I came here together. She teaches with two assistants. We are starting a circulating library and reading-room in chapel. Ours is the only Mission for many miles. We are sadly in need of books and newspapers or reading-matter. We are anxious to put into the hands of our people pure reading; there is plenty of the vile sort even out here, but oh, how scarce the good and elevating!"

Idol Worship in India.

A Festival to the Heathen God, Kanthaswamy. Singular Rites Observed.

A letter lately sent to
 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
 Misses Mary and Margaret Leitch (who have for many years past been engaged in missionary work in Ceylon and India), describe most interestingly a festival held in one of the Hindu temples
 —a temple to the god Kantha-swamy.
 Three native boys who had recently become converts to Christianity, were urged to attend at this festival, the temple being near their house. All the people of the village "were going to attend in order to make offerings, enjoy the excitement, and listen to the music, and the other village boys asked these three boys to go along with them, but to the surprise of all these boys absolutely refused to go. The Manager of this Kantha-swamy temple is a rich Sivite, who, in order to gain popularity among the Hindus, employs priests, and has idolatrous worship carried on in the temple daily. In addition to this, once every year a great festival is held which lasts for twenty-one days. During these days, many worshippers come to the temple bringing offerings.
 Every night at midnight, during this festival time, the idol is securely tied upon the back of a huge wooden painted animal, as a horse, an ox, a rat, a peacock, a swan, &c., (each night a different animal), and in a torchlight procession the whole is carried around the temple borne on the shoulders of men.

 A band of native musicians lead the way, (as shown in the photograph), playing on flutes, drums, cymbals, &c. The sky is lit up with numerous fire rockets, and the shouts of great crowds of people rend the air.

"As the annual festival at the village temple is the great excitement of the year for the people of that village, it can be easily understood that, when the other village boys asked these three boys to go along with them, and they utterly refused, those who had asked them were very much astonished, and asked their reasons for such singular behavior. The three lads replied that they had come to believe that there was one true God who made heaven and earth, who loved us and who had sent his Son to save us from our sins, and that idols were only pieces of brass, wood or stone, that they had no power, and that it was not only useless but wrong to worship them.

"This conversation was reported by the village children to their parents, and they in turn reported it to the manager of the temple, who, when he heard it, was very angry indeed, for he saw that if people began to believe that idols had no power, they would soon cease to worship them, and then he and his priests would lose all the money and the offerings which now the poor people were giving so freely, and on which he and others were living in great comfort.

"So the manager of the temple went in a great rage to the father and mother of the lads, and gave expression to all sorts of threats, but while the parents were doubtless frightened, the lads themselves were not dismayed. As has already been stated in a former issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the whole family was "out-casted" on their account, but these events have proved a blessing, for not only have the youths steadfastly adhered to their new faith, but there is a strong likelihood of the parents, who were formerly idolaters, being saved by grace as well.

Preaching to Lepers.

Writing from the Sandwich Islands to friends in this country, Rev. C. H. Yatman gives an interesting account of his visit to and ministrations among the lepers at the receiving station for the Molokai leper settlement. He says:

Preaching to lepers is not an every-day experience, nor a matter of ordinary moment. I have met them, preached to them, and said good-bye to them, for there is no hope of ever meeting them again in this world. The sentence of banishment was passed upon them day before yesterday, and the steamer now due will carry them off to the leper settlement on the island of Molokai where they wait slow but sure death.

Antonia's Tower.

The Citadel where Christ was Mocked and Paul was Imprisoned and where Jews and Romans met in Deadly Conflict.

ASSOCIATIONS of thrilling interest to the Christian, cluster about the old building, a picture of which appears on the first page. It stands on the north-west corner of the area
 once occupied by

Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem. The rough appearance of the stones in its lower part indicate that it was built on the ruins of a still older structure of which they formed a part. There is no difficulty in identifying those ruins. The minute description Josephus gives of Herod's Temple leaves no doubt that on this site stood the castle of Antonia, whose famous tower reared its head a hundred feet above the Temple buildings. When Herod undertook the rebuilding of the Temple, B.C. 21, he found at this corner a fortification, erected more than a hundred years before by Judas Maccabæus, called the Baris.
 Herod enlarged the work and strengthened and beautified it, making it not only a fortress, but a magnificent residence with baths and galleries and spacious halls and dormitories for the soldiers. Its tower overlooked the whole temple-area and a broad staircase within gave ready access to the gates and courtyard of the Temple, by which should a tumult occur, the soldiers could descend quickly to suppress it.
 The building extended along the entire length of the north wall of the Temple and at each of its four corners rose a tower.
 Three of these, says Josephus, were fifty cubits high, while the fourth rose to a height of seventy cubits. The magnificence of the Tetrarch ran riot in the construction of this palace. Josephus says that the kinds of stone used in its walls were countless. Whatever was rare abounded in it.
 The great dining hall had been constructed to supply table-couches for three hundred guests; others opened in all directions, each with a different style of pillar. The open space before the palace was laid out in broad walks planted with long avenues of different trees and bordered by canals flowing with clear cold water, the banks adorned by groups of statuary. The present meanness of the place is in striking contrast to all this magnificence. There is no need to inquire the cause. The land is in the hands of the Turk under whose sway everything goes to decay and repair is unknown.

But it is not of this departed magnificence that the Christian thinks as he gazes on the crumbling walls. His thoughts go back to the appalling outrage enacted within them in those early morning hours of the last day in the life of his Lord.
 The researches of the Palestine Exploration Society confirm the tradition that it was at Antonia that Christ was dragged when Pilate having delivered him to be crucified, the soldiers took him to "the common hall" and gathered unto him the whole band. Then there was the stripping and mocking and scourging—all the humiliation that would come when a gang of rough, brutal soldiers, had a meek, friendless prisoner at their mercy. The thought of it is agonizing. When it is over Jesus is conducted from those gloomy portals to the place of execution. This must have been the last roof that sheltered him during the last day of his earthly life.

One other scene hallows the place to the Christian heart. It was from this tower a few years later that the chief captain saw the Jews make their murderous assault on Paul in the Temple area and went to his rescue. It was to this safe place that he carried him to save him from being lynched and from the steps of this tower he made his memorable defence reported in Acts 22.

Only twelve years afterward the tower was the scene of an awful struggle. It was the last rallying place of the defenders of the city in the great siege; and there occurred that terrific hand-to-hand fight on which the ground was covered with the corpses of the slain, the Jews frantically trying to keep the Romans from entering the Temple. But they were overpowered and their holy and beautiful house was burned to ashes.

Ministry of John the Baptist.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 19. Luke 3: 15-22. Golden Text John 1: 29. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

CHRIST'S forerunner, John the Baptist, did not come in his own name, nor without a very distinct commission from on high. "There was a man sent from God whose name was John" (John 1: 6).

Not only was he aware of the very special circumstances attending his birth, and that he was the child of many prayers made by his parents for his people, and as we see very strikingly, by the fact of his solitary life in the desert, he was preparing for his ministry by direct contact with God—but even then and there he must make sure that he was in God's time for the commencement of his ministry. So important was this time for the future of his own people that God speaks of it in his Word in the same terms as the most important public event would be spoken of by historians: "In the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea, and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Iturea and of the region of Trachonitis, and Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene, Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests," what then? "The Word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness." This was in God's sight. "And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." No political event, no mighty power of man could do this work, could effect the remission of sins, the deliverance of mankind from sin, and ultimately from sickness, death and all the attendant evils which proceed from sin. The dignitaries mentioned, of State and Church could not appreciate the importance of this event, but in heaven above and in the hearts of all who have been born above, no political event whatsoever can approach the importance of this one. Salvation had been foretold (Isa. 53), but he who sees the end from the beginning did not foretell the centuries of the rejection of the Messiah. He leaves the lines open for the universal acceptance of the Messiah by men if they will. Quoting from Isa. 40: 3, Luke says of this ministry: "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. Every valley shall be filled and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight and the rough ways shall be made smooth and all flesh shall see the salvation of our God." No word about our earthly kingdom in the whole quotation! And this message of salvation was the burden of the Baptist's message. The temporal kingdom was all that the Jews of his day looked for, temporal power and glory and freedom from the humiliation of the Roman yoke. John, like his father Zacharias, entered into the thoughts of God, and went back to the causes of things; his country's shame and punishment were the result of the country's sin, and he prayed and waited for a deliverance from

The Root of the Evil.

And God showed him greater things than he looked for: a salvation which should not only touch the Jews, all flesh should see the salvation of our God. John believed in the future temporal prosperity of Israel, when his people should be no more a nation among the nations, but only as a result of a national humbling and turning to God, and it was this which he lived and labored to bring about. John knew from many Scriptures that there must be a day of vengeance and of wrath, before the Lord should reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem and before his ancients gloriously, and seeing multitudes coming, swayed by the popular movement, to be baptized of him, and aware that things had not gone deep with the majority of his people, as they had with him, he preached them an incisive sermon on reality, in no measured terms. He saw the trail of the serpent in them, and said, "O generation of vipers! who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth fruits worthy of repentance; and begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father, for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. And now also, the axe is laid unto the root of the trees; every tree therefore which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire." It was a searching Word. No external baptism, no form or ceremony would do now. The Christ was at hand, and he came to seek for fruit. Words would not stand for deeds, the axe was already in hand, and the fruitless trees must fall; no quarter for hypocrisy; no quarter for unreality; fruit or the fire was the message of this second Elijah, this man of the desert and of God. Away with the flimsy refuge, "We have Abraham to our father;" it is now the time to deal with the living God, who can, from the very stones, raise up children unto Abraham.

The stirring appeal from this man who was full of the Holy Ghost, told upon the multitude, and inquirers began to ask him, "What shall we do then?"

Very practical was the answer of God's messenger, "He that hath two coats let him impart to him that hath none;" renounce your covetousness, "and he that hath meat let him do likewise." Publicans came also to be baptized, who had their own special questions, "Master, what shall we do?" They were the tax gatherers, and reformation was sorely needed amongst them: "Exact no more than that which is appointed you." But the awakening touched yet other classes; the soldiers also came with their questions and he answered them: "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely, and be content with your wages." Any repentance which did not work such practical changes in the life of the penitent was not a repentance which would issue in "the remission of sins."

All this was but preparatory work to prepare the way for Another. The preaching of the Baptist had been heard of throughout the land; Jerusalem had turned out into the desert to hear him, and all the population of Judea as far as, and even beyond Jordan, and a spirit of confession had come over the people (Matt. 3: 5, 6), and some might have thought they saw indications that Jer. 50: 4 and Zech 12: 10-14 were about to be fulfilled. Men "were in expectation, and mused in their hearts of John whether he were the Christ or not." And John perceived it, and answered their thoughts by saying, "I indeed baptize you with water; but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose; he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire: whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and will gather the wheat into his garner; but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire."

The movement had so spread among the people that the authorities began to interfere, and the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to John to investigate the matter: "Who art thou?" Self had been renounced by this man; he only said who he was not: "I am not the Christ."

"Who art thou, that we may give an answer to them that sent us, what sayest thou of thyself?" John had nothing to say of himself but what God had already said of him in his Word. O blessed man to have nothing to say of himself but much to say of Jesus! This was the last of the preparation for his testimony to the Messiah. The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." Up till now all had been preparatory, this was the real burden of the Baptist's message, this was the salvation which, sooner or later, "all flesh" should see. Is not this a great lesson for us to learn as witnesses to our God? Before all flesh shall see the salvation of God in the sense of the conversion of the world God would have all flesh that we come in contact with see Christ in us.

"BAPTIZED OF HIM IN JORDAN."

It is inconceivable that he would grow up in ignorance of the strange circumstances attending his birth. There can be no doubt that his father and mother would be careful to communicate them to him as soon as he was capable of understanding them and that they would do all in their power to prepare him for fulfilling his mission. How long John remained under the care of his parents is not reported, but when the realization of his duty came upon him, when apparently he was about thirty years of age, he was not with them, but alone in the wilderness, the arid district of Judaea lying west of the Dead Sea. Yet he had kept in touch with current events as is shown by his answers to those who asked him about their duties. He clearly knew their circumstances and their faults. It was a time of national peace and of spiritual lethargy. There had been no voice from God for centuries. The spiritual teachers of the people had contented themselves with prescribing outward, formal, religious observances. Even the High Priesthood had fallen into so worldly a condition of compromise that two High Priests were holding office at the same time. The people had lost faith in the dry husk of their religion out of which all life had departed.

The religious stagnation of the time was suddenly stirred. John began to preach, and his discourses were not like those of the scribes, the authorized religious teachers of the day. Brushing contemptuously aside the idea of outward observance having any moral value, and of a man being necessarily good because of his descent from Abraham, which were the corner stones of the theology of the time, he declares boldly for moral and heart purity. Dependence on lineage and a trust in religious forms, even on his own rite of baptism, were alike delusive. Every man whose life was not right, though he were ten times a son of Abraham, and had kept all the ordinances, was in peril. This was the tone of his preaching, and, with it all, there was the dominant cry—the reason and essence of it all—"The kingdom of heaven is at hand." There must be preparation for it, and that preparation must be where the kingdom is to be—in the heart. The people came to be baptized. That was an easy matter. If a dip in the Jordan and some formula said over them, would secure safety, a man would be foolish to hold back. But when they came, they were received with a fiery torrent of denunciation. Baptism could do them no good, it was the Baptism of repentance they needed. This was a more serious matter. The voice of John was the voice of one of the old prophets. He was like Elijah in his fierce arraignment. It was scathing, and the people quailed as they listened. The alarm was necessary. So it is in these days. Before Christ comes into the heart with his message of peace, there must be a stirring-up of conviction. He is not appreciated until people feel that they need a Saviour.

I indeed baptize you with water. John spoke of his baptism as inferior to that which Christ would inaugurate. It was negative, merely the sign of morality and of repentance, but when Christ came he would baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. There would be power in the fire for purity and service. In Sidney's Life of Hill, the story is told of a Jesuit preaching baptismal regeneration to an Indian tribe. The chief listened till the talk was over and then said it was "nonsense talk." Pointing to one of his braves, he said "Beach-Tree gets mad with fire-water. He was baptized, but he gets mad with fire-water just the same. He get no good he old Beach-Tree still."

Descended in a bodily shape, like a dove upon him. That is, with the gentle, hovering motion peculiar to the alighting of the dove. The baptism of the Spirit must come upon him first before he baptized others. Julius Hare has a beautiful simile of the Spirit's work. He says that man walking through a forest near sunset might be in some doubt whether the sun was still above the horizon. The trees and bushes might hide the face of the lumina from him. But when he approaches an opening of the forest, he would know without seeing the sun, by the appearance of distant objects, whether or not it had set. If it was still in the sky, some object would reflect its rays. So with the Spirit; we may not see him in bodily shape as he appeared at the baptism, but we know that he is at work, by the lives of God's people. They shine as lamps which none but he could have lighted.

Whose fan is in his hand. This is the implement referred to by Isaiah (40: 24). It was a kind of scoop or shovel, sometimes a fork, with which the grain, having been beaten by the flail, was tossed against the wind which blew away the broken straw and chaff. The floor of the barn was thus strewn with the grain, small stones, clods of earth, etc., which were too heavy to be blown away. The had to go through another process. The earth and stones must be got rid of by sieve. When this was done, the floor was clear of impurities and nothing but grain was left. John's idea of his successor's work was like this. He would have a fan and a sieve and would thoroughly purify his floor. Into the kingdom of heaven, would set up, nothing would enter but what was fit to enter.

Herod being reproved by him. This Herod was a son of Herod the Great, the Herod who murdered the children at the time Christ's birth. He was a depraved man guilty of innumerable crimes. The Herodias mentioned was a grand-daughter of Herod the Great, a daughter of Aristobulus, an elder brother of the Herod whom she married. She was consequently his niece, and before marrying him she was the wife of Philip, another brother of her father's. Herod, whom she basely deserted to marry Herodias. She was a wicked, unscrupulous woman, worse in nature than her husband. John must have known that she was making a dangerous enemy when he denounced Herod for marrying her. It was implacable, and when her husband contented himself with imprisoning the prophet, she could not rest till she had contrived his death. History records another instance of a great man slain by a relentless woman. This was Cicero, who died about seventy years before John. Cicero offended Fulvia, the wife of Antonius, and she instigated her husband to bargain for his death. Promised by her he made it a condition of holding Augustus, that Cicero should be slain. Augustus was under many obligations to Cicero, but he was not the man to ally the life of a friend to remain an obstacle in his way to supreme power. He gave his consent and Cicero was beheaded. The story runs that his head was sent to Fulvia, as John's was sent to Herodias, and Fulvia took the ghastly trophy and dragging out the tongue that had so bitterly denounced her and her husband, she thrust her hairpin through it.

FEEDING 1500 DAILY AT VAN.

MISS KIMBALL'S CHEERING REPORT OF "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" FUND'S WORK AMONG THE DESTITUTE ARMENIANS.

Free Bakeries Employed—Clothing as well as Bread Supplied to the Starving Christians—The Great Army of Homeless Ones—Many More Martyrs for Christ Fall Beneath Turkish Swords—Help for other Centres of Suffering.

NE glimpse of cheer comes from unhappy Armenia. It is a letter from Dr. Grace W. Kimball, giving such a glorious account of the progress of the relief work which our readers have established in Van through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, as will bring a thrill of satisfaction to all who are aiding in this Christian cause. Dr. Kimball's letter is as follows:

VAN, Dec. 4th, 1895.

DEAR SIR:—Yesterday Mr. Hallward, British Vice-Consul, handed me your telegram announcing the thrice-welcome news that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund has reached $10,000. This news has given our real Thanksgiving Day. May God bless every one who has contributed to this noble work!

And yet, this sum even now begins to look small and inadequate before the daily increasing flood of utter ruin that sweeps down on us. And the only help we see in these immediate necessities is in the help that may come from America and England. The villages are devastated. The ready official report of one hundred and seventy-six ruined, plundered villages has been received; and only eight out of thirteen districts in the Province of Van have been definitely reported. While from the remaining districts come rumors of even more terrible things than have taken place in the remote regions. Rumors come that whole villages forcibly converted to Islam; of the murder of many helpless people, especially of priests and other ecclesiastics, and of wholesale pillaging.

The condition of this city, so far as the daily bread of the people is concerned, goes from bad to worse daily. Since the last of October, the shops and all business have been suspended. This throws early the entire population out of employment—a population already poor that its utmost exertions were barely sufficed to keep the wolf from the door in ordinary times. Imagine the condition of the people now, when the villages, the great source of the city trade, are ruined and their inhabitants fleeing to the city for support; and what trade there might be in and for the city itself entirely stopped.

The bakery which we opened on the strength of your first letter and assistance on the 23d of November has taxed to its utmost capacity and beyond; so that we have been giving orders on another bakery as a temporary thing, and are having a new bakery fitted up, to be ready in two or three days. We are now feeding about 1500 people daily, and are distributing clothing to these people and hundreds of other villagers who are in greatest need. We have laid in 1,500 bushels of wheat and a considerable amount of wood at very advantageous prices.

Just here, the man in charge of the bakeries comes and reports that the Governor is giving out orders for bread to the villagers. This Governor is a good man, and we do not doubt his good intentions. But as the treasury is entirely empty, we do not anticipate any very material assistance from Turkish sources. However little it may be, it will doubtless be noised abroad, especially in English papers, as a proof of the tender feelings the Government entertains for its Christian subjects. The hand that smote will not long comfort. I will administer to the best of my ability with the assistance and advice of Mr. Hallward and Rev. Mr. Allen of our Mission. Dr. Reynolds has not yet returned, but we hope to see him soon, and to avail ourselves of his ripe experience.

Please assure all contributors and helpers in this work of Armenian relief, of the deepest gratitude of the poor people, and of the hearty thanks of us who are witnesses of their misery. Thanking you especially for this noble service that you are rendering Christianity, I remain, etc.,

G. W. KIMBALL.

Rev. Herbert M. Allen, missionary of the American Board at Van, writes to Dr. Klopsch under date Dec. 4:

We were very much gratified to learn that already your Fund had reached ten thousand dollars. I can assure you that you could have undertaken no nobler work than this. Thousands of unhappy people will never cease to bless your readers. Dr. Reynolds and myself will be very glad to undertake our share in the work of relief. Please accept our hearty thanks in behalf of the suffering people for all that you are doing.

Rev. H. O. Dwight, of the American Board, writes from the Bible House, Constantinople, December 15th:

The destitute villagers are flocking into Van and they will need all you can send them before the winter is through.

During the past week the carnival of slaughter has been continued with tireless energy and terrible ferocity by the Turks and Kurds. The fall of Zeitoun is now denied and fighting is still going on there. From every side come reports of atrocities by Turks, Kurds, and Circassians—villages swept by fire, the men massacred, the women either slain or reserved for a fate worse than death. Thousands of women have been carried away captive to be a testimony to the faith. In almost every village the strong men and youths were killed, and in nearly every case they met death with the fortitude of true martyrs. Many were killed with horrible tortures, because of their refusal to deny Christ. Among those who so perished were the Armenian pastors at Khizan, Halakeny, and Koh.

Although in official communications the atrocities are denied by the Turkish government, the statements issued by the Porte are nowhere credited. Denials of the massacres of Trebizond and Erzeroum were circulated, despite the statements of American and European Consular officials, missionaries, and Armenian survivors, supplemented by the photographs of the piles of dead in the streets and cemeteries (taken by a correspondent of the London Graphic). One of the illustrations on this page shows a number of Armenian prisoners who were arrested by the authorities after the Trebizond massacre, and who may sooner or later share the fate of their hapless fellow-countrymen. They were arrested on the pretext that they caused the riot, and six of them have already been condemned to death.

In a letter from the village of Gemarek, near Kæsarea, dated Nov. 25, written by a resident of that place to a relative in New York, the writer discloses a condition of affairs that is an illustration of what is going on everywhere throughout Asia Minor:

ARMENIANS HELD PRISONERS AFTER THE TREBIZOND MASSACRE.

come inmates of some vile Moslem harem. An illustration of the Turkish method of extermination is found in the case of the village of Hoh, in the Sandjak district. At first the aghas (or local magistrates) promised to protect the Christians, but when they saw villages burning in every direction, they refused to keep their word. All the Christians were told that, under the pain of death, they must accept Islam. They were assembled at the Mosque, and there eighty young men were picked out and led outside the village—for slaughter. Eight escaped, sixty-two were killed, and ten wounded. The young women of the village were taken to Turkish harems, and the survivors of the Christian population were scattered among other villages.

In every district there is the same tragic story of massacre, outrage, pillage, and abduction; monasteries sacked, and Christian pastors and people butchered. In many villages the Armenian priests were among the number who laid down their lives as "You can form no idea of the extent of the misery, by merely hearing of it. In our vicinity there are about twenty Armenian villages, all of which have been plundered by Circassians 'Karappapacks' and Turkish barbarians. Our village alone has been saved thus far. For eleven days, day and night, we have protected the village against attacks by the common enemy and many attacks we have repulsed. We gathered our forces together and surrounded the village with our young men, all fully armed. During these eleven days, the women and children were assembled in the churches for safety. Meanwhile, our eight hundred young defenders were set around the village. It was well that we had made these preparations. Soon a body of Circassian cavalry, perhaps 300 or 400 strong, swept down upon us, and behind them came thousands of foot-soldiers. Several times they attacked our village, but every time they were repulsed with loss. Thank God that we have thus far escaped the fate that has overtaken so many others!

"But the enemy did as much damage in another direction. Our winter stores of grain, flour, etc., were plundered, and the mill where much of the grain belonging to the villagers was kept, were destroyed by fire. In our own case, the family stock of grain, consisting of several large bins of wheat, etc., in the mills, was destroyed. Now a famine is raging among all the villages. I beg you, if it be possible, to send us aid in order to support not only our family, but to help our starving neighbors. If we had not spent some of our means on material for defence, what would have become of us all?

DR. AND MRS. REYNOLDS, VAN.

"Amid all this trouble and sorrow, it is pleasing to mention that our trials have brought to the front one good friend, an excellent and just Turk. Jadi Oghloo Ali-Agha has helped us a good deal. He united his friends with us and with arms in his hands resisted the attacks, showing his nobility and true humanity."

From the town of Mardin near Diarbeker, in Mesopotamia, comes a sad story of Kurdish massacre and pillage. Letters received in New York state that the Mesopotamia Christians of Mardin were suddenly attacked by a large body of Kurds, the town being surrounded. News had already been received of the burning of many villages and the massacre of thousands of peaceful peasants, but the Mardin attack came like a thunderbolt. Many hundreds were butchered in a few hours. The writer of the letter personally knew one hundred and twenty of the victims, most of them his close friends, some being near relatives. A number of native ministers of the Gospel were slain, including Revs. Hanousch, Aboosch and Georges Hadorshah. Another, Brother Georges, received two shots in his breast.

The town is a scene of terror and desolation; groups of weeping mothers and crying children shelter themselves in the houses, while all around, and even upon the floors are the tell-tale pools of blood that show where the martyrs fell under the Kurdish swords. Dead bodies, clotted with blood that had flowed from great gaping wounds, lay everywhere in sight. There were other horrors that added to the terror—the attacks on the native women and girls, who were subjected to nameless abuse."

Special appeals having been made by Armenians now in this country to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund, to extend its operations to Mardin and Gemarek, an effort will be made to do so and to afford, through the American Board missionaries, such relief as may be needed, and also to other centres of distress. The principal field of the Relief Fund, as already explained, is at Van, where Dr. Kimball and her associates are doing an excellent work among the swarms of refugees from the destroyed villages of that and adjoining provinces. At the same time in view of the unprecedented destitution all over Armenia, the missionaries acting as distributors of the Fund are expected to give prompt attention to any specially urgent case that may come under their observation, in order that human life may be saved and suffering averted. All contributions to the Relief Fund will be acknowledged in these columns. Contributions during the past week are acknowledged on page 36 of this issue.

RICHMOND'S GOSPEL WAGON.

Missionary Williams' Work in the Streets of the Southern City—A Story of Spiritual Struggle.

Over the land, agencies are multiplying for the dissemination of the glorious Gospel of Jesus Christ. On platform and in tent, on street corner and in dingy alley or foul slum, the worker for souls finds the means of carrying the message of love to other hearts. Not the least effective auxiliaries in the work are the gospel boat and gospel wagon, the first to ply on our lakes and rivers, dropping the Gospel seed wherever it finds an audience, the second to travel from town to town and village to village, along the dusty highways, frequently reaching places where there are no regular church services.

It was the privilege of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently to describe the gospel wagon of the Central Union Mission in Washington, D. C., where a band of earnest workers have made excellent use of it during the past season. Another Southern city—Richmond, Va.—now comes to the front with a gospel wagon that has also rendered effective service, although only a few months in commission. The wagon is shown in the illustration on this page.

Every Sunday afternoon the large vehicle can be seen in some section of the city, drawn by two stout gray horses, and the sweet tones of the organ and the singers can be heard upon the Sabbath breeze. So greatly has the work grown and interested non-church-going people, that it has been determined to take the wagon out on week-days as well as on Sundays, and so enlarge the scope of its usefulness, and make it possible for every man, woman and child among the non-church-going population in Richmond to hear the Gospel preached at least once a week.

Rev. Geo. F. Williams, a well-known Baptist minister, is in charge of the wagon and is enthusiastic over the success so far achieved. He had known for a long time what good results these Gospel wagons were accomplishing in other cities, and he made several efforts to start up the movement here. He finally got up an improvised conveyance in which he conducted his labors. This vehicle was furnished free of charge by Mr. W. D. Sutherland for the first meetings. It was then necessary to secure singers and workers to assist Mr. Williams. He had been so impressed with the great need for this kind of work in Richmond, that he determined that the wagon must be on the street at the time fixed, so he had to look around for assistants. Messrs. Wood, of the Grace Street Baptist Church, and Ernest Throckmorton, of the Fulton Baptist Church with whom Mr. Williams had previously talked about this work, were the only persons the preacher was sure he could depend upon for aid. Just about this time, however, Mr. Williams met a company of singers and workers from the Fulton Baptist Church, who agreed to accompany him with his wagon. Since that time most of his working force has come from this church, although others have assisted at one time or another. Services have been held every Sunday afternoon. As the work grew it became apparent that a more suitable conveyance would have to be procured. This required money, part of which was soon raised, and the vehicle was ordered. In fitting up the wagon Mr. Williams was the recipient of a number of donations. It was the plan of the pastor of the wagon that it should be driven every Sunday afternoon into sections where many people, owing to circumstances, cannot get out to church. The song-service soon attracts those upon the streets, and even many in the houses, and soon a large crowd assembles. There is a short sermon, prayer and song, and some little personal work, among those in the audience, among whom tracts are distributed and personal appeals made. Many conversions have been effected and an encouraging number converted by these wagon meetings. As soon as a conversion is made the name of the person is added to the company of Sunday School pupils.

The work is an innovation in Richmond, but it is a substantial one, which has already shown its good fruits. Rev. Mr.

Williams, the originator of the movement, has given his life to mission work. He is an A.B. of Rochester University, and spent two years at the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. On leaving he became a missionary in the Southern army, and after the close of the war went to the county and city of Mobile, Ala. He established the Marine Street Mission in that city, raising the money by personal appeal, and working with his own hands on the building. He became pastor of the new church which, under his faithful leadership, soon outgrew the frame building, and he then built, in the same manner, a large brick structure, which became the Palmetto Street Church. Soon after this church became self-sustaining, Mr. Williams removed to Richmond, and took charge of the Venable Street Mission, which was then only a Sunday School, worshipping on the corner of Venable and Eighteenth streets in a small frame building. In a few months afterward (April 26, 1874) he organized a church, which soon outgrew the small building, and by his efforts was enlarged and improved, and is now the Venable Street Baptist Church. This Church is now presided over by Rev. J. S. Dill, D.D.

Mr. Williams' arduous labors subsequently impaired his health, and by advice of physicians he was induced to try a Southern climate, and accepted a call to the Ridge Spring Church, South Carolina. There he did a fine work in his own church increasing the membership and developing in them the missionary spirit. He also found opportunity to preach for and hold meetings with feeble churches in the surrounding country. After a seven years' pastorate in South Carolina, he returned to Virginia, and became pastor of Bethel and Riverton Churches, preaching also regularly at mission stations in Boyce and Millwood. During a pastorate of eighteen months he organized a church at Millwood, Clarke County, which is now a flourishing church, worshipping in a neat building, and is presided over by Rev. W. S. Dorset. In December, 1888, he was called to be city missionary of Richmond, under the auspices of the Baptist City Missionary Society. Taking charge of this work in its infancy, when there were no plans, and only an experimental organization, he mapped out a system of his own, and set at work influences that were hitherto unfelt, thus enlisting interest in the work, so that the little band grew to a membership of over six hundred. At the end of four and a half years he resigned his position under the auspices of the Baptist City Missionary Society and undertook and has successfully carried on for two and a half years, volunteer mission work. God has greatly blessed his labors.

Bible Chronology.

There is no system of chronology specifically set forth in the Bible. What is commonly understood to be Bible chronology is in the main, Archbishop Usher's calculations, that have been given a place on the margin of the English Bible. The earlier portion of these calculations is based on the references to the ages of the patri-archs in the "Recensions" or critical revision of the Hebrew text from which the English version was translated; but these ages are given differently in the Septuagint, or ancient Greek translation of the Old Testament, in the Samaritan Pentateuch, and, again, in the Masoretic Hebrew text, from which the English Bible is translated. These differences amount in the aggregate to fourteen or fifteen centuries, as prior to the time Abraham's leaving Haran. Hence it is agreed by all scholars that there cannot be a common agreement on this point while we have no fuller information.

Church Union Sorely Needed.

Dr. Josiah Strong's Plan Further Explained—The Churches' Opportunity.

WIDESPREAD interest has been aroused by the publication of the remarkable article from the pen of Rev. Josiah Strong, D.D., in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD. In that article Dr. Strong advocated a national union of Christian Churches in the interest of public morality, social reform, and Christian benevolence. Such an organization, it was explained, would not affect present denominational lines in any degree. The prime objects of the union would be to apply the principles of Christ's teachings to the soon the statute-book of the state, but also the stronger, unwritten, and self-enforcing laws of society. The church might thus become what it ought always to have been—the controlling conscience of the social organism. This the church must become if it is to reconstruct society on Christian principles. There is a vast and important remedial work yet to be done, but there is another work still more important. It is more important to prevent pauperism than to cure it, more important to stop producing criminals than to reform them; and our social system is to be so readjusted and reformed as to remove the causes of pauperism and crime, the churches must take large views of their relations to society, must recognize their obligation to teach the second great law of Christ, and as the social conscience, must hold all men, all corporations, all institutions, to a faithful observance of that law. All of which is impossible, without some form of organization and co-operation.

There are increasing indications that the churches do not soon organize for the prosecution of social reforms they will lose their opportunity of leadership and with their great opportunity to regain their loss hold on the masses and to shape the civilization of the future. For good men representing reforms and philanthropic interests which have sprung up outside the churches, are beginning to feel after some form of organization which will afford the advantages of co-operation. Some common centre is needed in the interest of economy and efficiency where efforts to improve the community may be co-ordinated and adjusted to each other in some comprehensive plan—a common centre to which information may be brought and in which suggestions and complaints may be made—a common centre, too, where the good citizens of the community will want a better state of things can find each other. Elijah was disheartened and God's chosen ones in Israel were weak because the seven thousand who feared God were known only to him and not to each other. In this city there are "seven thousand" men who have bowed the knee to the Baal, the political machine or kiss the Mammon of utterly selfish living, but who are weak and disheartened because they are ignorant of each other. As they will remain weak and disheartened as long as they are one think, "I, even I only, am left." Doubtless there are enough good men in every community to save it, if they would only find each other and act together.

But the various Christian denominations have not come near enough to each other to see distinctly the image of the common Master. Let them join in cooperative work, and they will be acquainted.

Dr. John Henry Barrows writes: "The churches must first learn to co-operate, and then later they will achieve whatever unity seems desirable." And the lament of Dr. Roswell D. Hitchcock said: "If every organic union comes, it will come through co-operation." Certainly churches of denominations which cannot co-operate cannot coalesce.

All churches known as Evangelical have the great essentials of Christianity in common; they differ only in non-essentials. It is not evident that the churches of a community, which are united in the great essentials of Christian faith and experience, and which at the same time share the great responsibility of Christianizing that community, are in reality much more closely related to each other than churches a hundred or a thousand miles away, with which the only distinct bond is some non-essential of doctrine or a common form of government or ritual?

All churches and individuals in sympathy with the objects outlined above are welcome to membership in this proposed national church alliance. It is adapted to large and small cities, towns and villages. All who are interested in the work can be furnished with full information on the subject, gratis, in the form of pamphlets and leaflets, on sending name and address to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

lution of social problems, to ally the churches in all that concerns human welfare, to secure united action along all civil and moral movements affecting large communities and in brief "to stand in the name of Christ on the side of practical religion, good citizenship, the enforcement of law, the promulgation of sobriety, prevention of cruelty, alleviation of suffering, correction of injustice, rescue of the unfortunate, reformation of the depraved and kindred ends"—all the activities of such an alliance being made subservient to spiritual results.

With such a union as Dr. Strong has pictured in actual and widespread operation, it would be impossible to estimate the amount of good it might accomplish. Nothing on this continent could withstand the tremendous influence of the allied churches, presenting a solid and compact front in behalf of the highest interests of humanity and society. Discussing the need of such a Union, Dr. Strong writes in his book, The New Era:

Co-operation would not only afford the churches a means of educating public opinion, but also a medium for expressing it, which is hardly less needed. Not unfrequently there are bills before our state legislatures or the national Congress which do violence to the moral sense and the Christian conscience of the people. The obnoxious measure may arouse popular indignation, but before the storm can gather and break the bill becomes a law. The disgraceful New Jersey race-track legislation in the interest of gambling affords a good illustration.

And Christian men, if they will find each other out and co-operate, can make and unmake not only the laws spread

A New Year's Tale.

WE had drawn our chairs around the fire, and made the circle a close one, for the night was bitterly cold. The wind howled in the forest as if a pack of wolves were loose and famished for food. The sky had been low hung and gray since early morning. At dusk the white flakes began to fall, the thick heavy and in which several clusters cling together. By the time father came in from milking, and bedding the horses and cows comfortably for the night, you could not see the fence, nor the bars at the end of the lane. Father was red with cold as he wound his great woolen comforter, that came up well above his ears, and hung his heavy old overcoat on the nail in the entry. "It's well for them that have no house to go to this night," he said, quoting a family proverb. It meant "well for those ready in the house."

"Yes, John, dear," said our sweet mother, adding "I've made oat scones and fried sausages for supper, I knew you'd need something hot."

"And coffee, mamma, you'll have coffee, won't you?" cried Louis, "Tea is so slop- on a very cold night."

"Coffee, if you want it, my boy," said mother. "One's as little bother as the other, if Sadie will grind the coffee, or if you will, Louis, as you are the pleader in the case, and Sadie is busy with her fancy work."

Well, we had supper and a jolly one it was, and then on the last night of the year, we settled down to a quiet homely evening with fun, and songs and stories. What cared we for a bitter storm, with our own all safe, and not a jar in the sweet melody of our beautiful love-life as a household, to whom God had been good far beyond all deserts.

We had just finished "Annie Laurie," and the echoes had hardly died away, when Sadie declared she heard a call for help out there in the snow. Nobody else heard any sound except the twisting and whirling of bending boughs, tormented with the wind, and the wail of the wind itself, rattling like a fiend around the rattling lines and clattering like a dragon on horseback against the eaves. There are violent snow-storms and angry snow-storms and this was one of the furious sort.

But whether Sadie heard anything or whether she did not, Leo, our old retriever as sure in his mind that somebody was outside. Leo sniffed under the mat by the door, and barked and whined. Then he came to father and tugged at his coat, and then got up, lit the lantern, put on his hat and muffler, and went into the storm, to at his heels.

Presently they returned. Father was dragging what looked like a great bundle behind him. Leo rushed after it, barking with the greatest excitement. The snow followed them all in a white whirling cloud and the cold came in with the fierceness of an invading army. We hurried to shut the door, and then mother and the girls aided the bundle.

It was a slip of a maiden not much beyond childhood. She was so pretty as she was unconscious before our eyes, that Louis held his breath with wonder and pleasure. Father began to rub her cold hands, Sadie lifted her temples, mother pulled off her soaked and sodden shoes and stockings. When she opened her blue eyes and gasped for vice, then, in a faint, flute-like voice, asked, "Where am I? Is this heaven?"

"No, my dear," said mother, holding a glass of warm milk to her lips, and putting her strong gentle arm under the girl's head, "it isn't heaven. Its Flyaway Farm, that stands on the hill near Oakhurst."

"And it's not so far from being a heavenly-like place," said father, as he sat down beside the hearth again.

Who was this girl, and how came she to be alone in such a storm? None of our neighbors but would have known better than to venture forth, in such weather as had threatened since morning. But this was a stranger, and when she came to herself, she proved to be of a graceful bearing and of an air seldom seen in our plain country-side. As for her looks, she was not fashioned of common clay, but of the finest porcelain, the loveliest thing you ever dreamed of, and not past twenty years old.

"I am Dorothy Lester," she told us, "and I've come from Honolulu, where I lost my parents, to stay with my Uncle James Quincy. Uncle did not expect me so soon, but he knew I was on the way. I left the railroad at noon and came in the stage to the Corners. There, I got out, and the driver told me how to go on, but I lost my way in the snow."

"Abominable conduct in William Scott," said my father, "to let a girl, and a stranger, start on such a road, with such a storm brewing."

"Well," said mother soothingly, "You are here now, and God watched over you, dear child. Here you'll remain till the weather changes, and then we'll take you to your uncle's."

"Tis an ill wind that blows nobody good," said Louis, who was uncommonly pleased with the addition to our party.

"Well, we had Dorothy with us four splendid shut-in days, when the snow walled us away from the world, and nobody came in or went out. She shared our happy New Year festivities, and joined our family prayers, and we treated her as if she were Noah's dove that had fluttered out of the tempest into the ark. We all felt sorrowful when the time came that father harnessed the gray horses to the old sleigh, piled in the robes, put a glowing footstool in the bottom for Dorothy's small feet, and then glided away with a guest we had learned to love."

"I wouldn't mind it so much," said Louis, as he turned mournfully from the door, "if her Aunt Miriam Quincy were like anybody else, like our dear mother, for instance, but she is so cross and hateful!"

"Oh! well," said Sadie cheerfully, "Dorothy won't have to stay there always. Girls marry and go to homes of their own."

Which was precisely what Dorothy did in another New Year. Ask Louis what he thinks of the wife God brought him from over the sea, and sent to his arms on the wings of the wind. "A prudent wife," however you find her, "is from the Lord."

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The Lepers of India.

There are in India thousands of lepers who are spiritually neglected by the native priests and to whom Christian missionaries have undertaken to teach the Word of Life. A lady missionary, Mrs. Osborne, treating on the subject says: "On all sides these poor lepers are begging to be taught reading. They see the improvement in the twenty now learning, and all long to share in it. Then, as if to meet that want, a young leper was admitted a few weeks ago. He had been remarkably well educated, and, I believe, is a Christian. He is about twenty-two years of age, and is almost broken-hearted at being banished to his living tomb, and begs most piteously for aid in some way. While thinking and praying about him it struck us that if we could employ him to teach the others, what he was paid for it would enable him to get the remedies he is so anxious to use for the alleviation of his own sufferings. They are praying to be taught, and here is one well qualified to teach them, and who must in any case live amongst them."

"Another need which is constantly pressing itself upon me is a little home, where the young children of lepers, who are as yet free from the taint of leprosy may be placed, and brought up amid healthy surroundings. I am assured by the European doctor that it is quite possible for these little ones to grow up quite healthy if properly cared for in early years. We are most anxious for these little ones to be removed from scenes of infection and danger to a place of safety."

To Work for Christ in Africa.

ABOUT fifteen years since, a young colored lad named Cornelius McKane, born and resident in Demarara, South America, worked his passage on a vessel coming from thence to New York. His grandmother was a daughter of a King of the Veys, a tribe near the coast of West Africa, then, and now well known for intelligence and energy. They are idolaters as no missionaries have been sent to them. Being brought early in her life to South America, and instructed by missionaries there, the grandmother of Cornelius became an earnest disciple of

MR. AND MRS. MCKANE.

Jesus. She impressed the young mind and tender heart of her grandson with the strong belief that he was the chosen and called of God to go, when educated, to Africa, and give to her former people the precious Gospel of Christ. To this purpose as to the pole-star of his earthly hope, the young Cornelius has proved ever true.

After graduating from a New York public school, he went, at the age of twenty, to Africa, made his way alone through forests and streams to the heathen tribe, was affectionately recognized by an aged sister of his grandmother, acknowledged by the people and entreated to become their king, but he soon explained to them his very different designs. After living for a few years in Africa and seeing the great need of medical missions, he decided to return to America and prepare himself for this life work. The expenses of his journey were paid by a person in Monrovia, Liberia. The earnest young student continued his studies at the University of Vermont from which he graduated with special honors. He was for a time employed as teacher of Anatomy. To obtain means to go to Africa he went to Savannah, Ga., and worked hard at his profession. There he married Dr. Alice Woodby, and together they founded and conducted in Savannah a "Training School for Nurses," and graduated their first class. Having acquired means sufficient to purchase their outfit for Africa, their school being well established, they left it in care of another physician and one of the trained nurses, and after spending a few days in New York they started, June 8th, 1895, in a small sailing vessel for Monrovia, Africa. Letters from them state that they have opened a Dispensary, and hope soon to open what will be the first hospital on all the coast of West Africa. They have no missionary society and no promises of assistance except those found in the Word of God. They are simply trusting and working for their own support and the establishment of the Gospel work they have undertaken. Any form of practical sympathy and help would doubtless be made available for the furtherance of their Gospel work in that unenlightened land.

Missions in Polar Lands.

MISSIONARY work in Alaska makes slow but substantial progress. The country has an area of 531,000 square miles, and a population of 32,052, composed of Indians, Eskimos, Thlingets, Aleuts, and some white traders, educators, etc. Most of the Aleuts are adherents of the Russian Greek Church. The other natives are barbarians, and many are fetish-worshippers, practicing polygamy, child marriage, infanticide, slavery, witchcraft, and sometimes cannibalism.

Greenland, with an inhabited area of about 47,000 square miles and a population of 10,516, has been evangelized by Lutherans from Denmark, and by Moravians. The western coast is practically Christianized. The Lutherans count 8,175 adherents at twelve stations, with three Danish and four native pastors. They have a seminary for the training of young native pastors and teachers at Godthaab. The Moravians number 1,591 communicants at six stations. They have within a year established the first station on the east coast among a people whose existence was unknown until 1883. The new station is on the Tessinyak Bay, near Cape Dan. There is a good harbor and a stream abounding with fish. The Moravians have also recently established a new station among the Eskimo seal fisheries on Blackwell's Island, Cumberland Sound. The work in Greenland is beset with difficulties due to the cold climate, with a winter temperature of twenty-six degrees below zero (New Herrnhut, 1894), and to the consequent scanty means of support, as well as to the dullness and lack of receptivity in spiritual things generally shown by Greenlanders. A great safeguard to the morals of the people has been, however, the treaty forbidding any but Danish traders to land in the harbors except by special permission. Through the enforcement of this treaty the natives have been largely shielded from contaminating influences which usually come from the immorality and intoxicants introduced by traders. Labrador's population is about 6,000 in winter and over 50,000 during the four months of the cod-fishing season, when fishermen and their families come to catch enough fish to pay their debts, which most of them have contracted during the winter months. The only Christian work among them is carried on by the Mission to the Deep-sea Fishermen. The Moravians have six stations, with about six hundred communicants and 1,400 church members, among the Eskimos of that region, and have been the means of establishing Christian law and order in northern Labrador.

Missionary Progress in Japan.

Dr. Amory Bradford, who went out to Japan to see whether the churches there were strong enough to stand alone, has come to the conclusion that they cannot yet do without missionaries, but that only men of ability, well trained, and with a special aptitude for languages, should seek Japan as a field of labor. The Japanese are often thinkers and readers, and can only be aided by able men. Dr. Bradford had reliable testimony that the labors of the missionaries have put new life into Buddhism and Shintoism, very much as they have revived the ancient religions of India, but only to slay them. The paganism of ancient Rome was quickened under Julian the Apostate into a spasmodic vigor, but its end was come. So will it be with the false religions of to-day.

The Weaponry of Death.

WHAT marvelous ingenuity our day has shown in the invention of weaponry of death. The old bullet did not kill sure enough, so we have the minie ball that will do its work with more precision and at longer range. We could not destroy a war ship soon enough, so we have the beautiful torpedo by which we can blow sky-high the general and all his troops. Ordinary powder is obsolete, and so we have dynamite which works so beautifully that it can kill a hundred people where the other could kill only ten. The Patent Office at Washington is ever and anon receiving some new style of weapon by which we can skilfully put out of the embarrassments of this life in quick time a great multitude of people. And if the art of invention should continue in this direction for a century, perhaps two armies confronting each other, if they understood their business well, could destroy each other, and none be left on either side to tell the story. But it seems now as if the glorification of missiles of death were going to be exchanged for appreciation of men who can save life instead of destroying it, and as if the doctor would be more honored than the major-general. God has ten the day. Our poor human race has had it hard enough. Man goes forth assaulted all through life. Indeed, the attack begins in infancy, and the cradle is bombarded with croups and scarlet fevers and whooping coughs, and the cradle that survives is in some respects like the ark of bulrushes in which the infant Moses rode safely out among the crocodiles. But because he has survived the infantile diseases let not the man think he is to escape further assault. Pneumonia takes after his lungs, and diphtheria after his throat, and ophthalmia after his eyes, and rheumatism after his muscles, and neuralgia after his nerves, and toothache after his jaws, and deafness after his ears, and all his life a man must be on his guard or positively in battle against physical ailments. But I thank God medical skill is now so marshaled that before many years have passed, the present list of diseases which have had full sweep all the ages will fall back or have nine-tenths of the horror of their attack withdrawn.

Among the ages this century will be remembered not only for the weaponry of death which it invented, but for the modes of conquering all manner of disease, which in its later hours it contrived to overcome. Meanwhile, as the doctors are combating the physical disorders of the world, the Gospel of Christ will go on with its spiritual triumphs until the human race, extricated and disenthralled, will find itself in an Eden of which the original Paradise was a prophecy and an antetype. God never yet projected a failure, and he did not build this world to have it despoiled. Let owls and whip-poor-wills go back into the night while we listen for the morning lark at the opening gates of the rising day. Hail 1896 to be a brighter, a better, a grander year than any of its six thousand predecessors.

Storms and Telegraphy.

THE impression is abroad that in our time there are more accidents, worse cyclones, worse sicknesses, worse disasters of all sorts than in other days. All this is a mistake. There are no more of these devastations in proportion to the world's number of inhabitants than there always have been, but the telegraph and press associations gather them all up and put them before our eyes with all the particulars. Instead of knowing only that which goes on in our neighborhood, as in olden time, we have through wire and type a semi-omnipresence and we are informed of all the important things that happen within ten thousand miles. As to hurricanes, Satan was always the prince of the power of the air, and when he wishes to take a ride he gets astride a cyclone and with red spur of lightning urges on the wild courser until forests and villages are prostrated. But when vast regions of this country were uninhabited, a cyclone might caper around for a week and nobody hear of it. In the year 1776 a whole convention of blizzards met in Dakota and not one breath of their utterances was reported. In 1812 a hurricane flew a thousand miles through the Northwest, and only ruffled the fur of buffalo and sank an Indian's canoe and wrecked a bevy of wild pigeons. But now this country is getting so thoroughly peopled that tornadoes have no room to play without upsetting something. If some evening a whirlwind takes a little circuit after tea in Georgia, the next morning we all know about it. A cyclone can have no privacy, and its every move is reported. Every morning and evening we feel the sick pulse in a palace at Berlin, while the old German Emperors like Otho and Conrad and Arnulf might have been sick ten years, and except a handful of people, the world knew nothing about it. Now the harnessed lightning is by wire bridge and bit turned this way and that and compelled to carry all kinds of tidings. No wonder the overworked and tyrannized lightnings sometimes out of revenge strike and consume men and dwellings. Fame once meant being known by fifty thousand people. Fame now means being known by fifty million. Charlemagne was not as widely spoken of in his time as now is some pugilist. It is not because there are more accidents, or more sicknesses, or more deaths, or more occurrences, or more heroisms, or more suicides, or more catastrophes, but because such things are immediately reported, telegraphed and published. All this is bringing the whole human family in sympathy.

American Art.

SOME have deplored the slowness of American art and the fact that we have no great art centre as may be found in other lands. The time has not come, but it will come. I see the dome of that great temple of art in the future. Into that vast structure shall be gathered many of the most famous canvasses and marbles of other lands, but in it American art will stand and hang its mightiest achievements. The Raphaels and the Titians of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries will come from the banks of the Hudson and the Mississippi, the Potomac and the Oregon, the Penobscot and the Alabama. God did not exhaust himself when he furnished the artists of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. He has not done his best. There are centuries to come that will eclipse any art centuries that are past. In that gallery will hang not so much the portraits of those who have destroyed life as of those who have saved it—pictures not of battlefields covered with corpses of men and carcasses of cavalry horses, but of harvests of grain such as have never yet grown, and groups of children roseate and romping. In that temple of American art there shall be painted windows more wonderful than those of York cathedral, columns carved more exquisitely than those of St. Mark's at Venice, and ceilings surpassing those of the Sistine Chapel covered with Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment." Encourage our American artists, who, amid many disheartenments, are clearing the way for that brilliant century.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

H. Vernon Smith. Is there any truth in the discovery of a statement, in inscription or otherwise, by Pontius Pilate, denying complicity in the crucifixion of Christ.

We believe not. The story is one of a class devised by literary sensation-mongers, and is not supported by the confidence of a single authority. Biblical scholars and Orientalists repudiate it.

F. McL., Olney, Ill. What is the reason the U. S. Government will not demand the Sultan to stop the massacres and afford relief for the Armenians?

Any interference by this country would be resented by those European governments that signed the Treaty of Berlin. Those governments are responsible for the sufferings of Armenia being prolonged, because, the Sultan having violated the treaty agreement, they have the right under the treaty to take such action as would stop the massacres and persecutions.

W. R., Monroe, Mich. What is the meaning of the statement in Eccles. 10:3, that a wise man's heart is at his right hand and the fool's at his left?

It is not intended to be understood literally. The preacher was not teaching anatomy. He apparently meant that the wise man was in earnest in his work; as we sometimes say, he puts his heart into it. The right hand being the one used in work the figure is plain.

Mrs. D., Woburn, Ill. 1. Will God require it at the hands of the nations that fail to interfere between the Armenians and the Turks? 2. Would it be wrong for the Armenian Christians to defend themselves with the sword? 3. Can you supply the remaining two verses and give the author's name, of the hymn

Down the valley
Among the sweet lilies?

1. It is certainly a fearful responsibility they are incurring, having the name of Christian nations, yet doing nothing to save their fellow-Christians from untold persecution and suffering, when a bold stand by a single European power would have saved thousands of lives. 2. Decidedly not. 3. Some of our readers may supply the information wanted.

J. S. B., Miser, Tenn. What did Paul mean by delivering a man to Satan (1 Cor. 5:5)?

The man, a member of the Corinthian Church, had fallen into grievous sin, and was living a vicious life. Paul, hearing of it, decides that he must be excluded from the church. He was suspended, as the event proved, for in his second epistle Paul directs that he shall be tenderly received, lest he be swallowed up by over-much sorrow (II. Cor. 2:7). The exclusion was leaving the man without means of grace, and Paul tells the object of it, namely, that the flesh, that is the lusts and passions of his nature, might be purged from him, so that his soul might be saved. The casting of him out of the church meant, in Paul's mind, like giving him up to punishment and the will of the enemy, not for his eternal destruction, but for temporary chastisement. Some commentators have thought that Paul's sentence included the infliction of some malady, which he certainly did inflict in another case (Acts 13:11), but that is not directly stated. The words imply discipline that would render the man less under the influence of his fleshly appetites.

J. F. F., Broadus, Conn. 1. Was Mothusselah the collector of the Lord's Prayer? 2. Can a person be a real Christian who has not clear evidence of his faith having been pardoned?

1. The record in Genesis appears to indicate that he was. We are not sure however whether the periods given refer to tribes or individuals. Biblical scholars are divided on the question. It was not uncommon to speak of a tribe by the name of its head (see Hosea 4:17 and other passages) and it may be so in the cases of these men whose lives seem to us so extraordinarily long. It has been suggested, but not proved, that in the record in Genesis the shorter period given in each case indicates the length of the life of the individual and the longer period that of his family. 2. Why not? He cannot use it with the depth of meaning that the Christian puts into it, but there is no reason why its petitions should not be used by him. 3. Yes, there are many real Christians who lack the assurance. It is strange that they should not have it, as God has promised to pardon those who come to him through Christ, and they ought to believe he will do what he says but their faith is weak. It prevents the feeling peace and rest but will not affect their salvation.

J. R. R., Dayton, Wis. Did the Saviour give his words to his disciples John 20:23 the power to forgive sins?

The words are generally understood in a declarative sense. They were authorized to give assurance of forgiveness to those who repented and exercised faith in Christ and to warn the impenitent of their doom. The gift of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost enabled them to see whether professions made were sincere.

C. H. H., Derry, N. H. Which of the two, wealth or poverty, is most provocative of crime?

It depends wholly on circumstances. Unquestionably wealth, or the struggle for the possession of it, is a great breeder of strife and envyings, but in the hands of a consecrated possessor, it becomes a widely-diffused blessing. Poverty, with the distress it entails, drives multitudes to crime; yet it may become a refiner and purifier of character in many cases. True happiness, even in the worldly sense, lies at neither extreme, but between the two (Prov. 30:8).

W. R., Truro, N. S. 1. Can conversion be separated from upbuilding? 2. Is it practically correct to consider the soul as the character? 3. Can it be proved, etc.?

1. Yes, it is the beginning of upbuilding. It is the turning again, the quitting of the old life and the starting of the new one. Upbuilding is more like sanctification than conversion. 2. The character is the combination of qualities distinguishing a person; the soul is a distinct entity. A man's character may change, but the soul is himself, his very life, incarnate. A violent, vicious man may become gentle and pure and we speak of his character being changed; but the soul grows, develops, yet does not change its identity. Character is practically the expression of the soul. 3. There are no data for answering the question and it is not worth considering.

C. W. Woodruff, Awala, Colo. Are the Baptists identical with the Anabaptists to whom reference was made in your journal some time ago?

The title is usually applied to a sect which arose in Germany in the sixteenth century. They baptized adults only and by immersion. The Baptists of our day agree with them so far, but have no sympathy with their ideas of government or with their excesses. The name also is inappropriate. It means baptizing again and the Baptists do not practise a second baptism except in case of a convert having been baptized in infancy by sprinkling the validity of which they do not recognize. They certainly believe in the divinity of Christ which the Anabaptists were disposed to question.

New York's Defences.

WHILE there is on both sides the Atlantic increasing confidence that the difficulty between England and this country will be amicably adjusted, the fact of war being even a remote possibility has raised the question of our readiness to meet it. New York particularly is reason for solicitude on the subject, as the event of a conflict with a great naval power like England, she would probably be an early object of attack. On this page we give pictures of the chief forts on which the city would have to rely for protection if our fleet should prove unable to prevent the enemy's vessels approaching the harbor. The outer and most important of these works is that at Sandy Hook which is also the most modern. It is constructed on the principle which experts believe to be the only one that is capable of rendering a fort able to resist the attack of heavy guns—that a granite and concrete wall screened with earthworks. Here is mounted the heaviest twelve inch gun, equipped with the new disappearing contrivance. In action the gun lies concealed behind the rampart, until the range-finder has calculated the position of the enemy's ship and telegraphed it to the man in charge of the gun. Then the gun is suddenly elevated above the bank, at the correct firing angle, fired, and its recoil brings it back behind the work, ready for reloading, having been visible to the enemy less than half a minute. Next to this fort comes Fort Wadsworth, a fine masonry work on the west shore of the Narrows. It was erected in 1846 and was formidable at that time, but its guns are of the Rodman pattern which are useless against armored vessels. The fort next in order is Fort Hamilton, erected in 1824, on New Utrecht Point, on the shore of Long Island. Its guns are of the same type as those on Fort Wadsworth, but a new steel gun is there, waiting its carriage, which is to have the disappearing equipment. At present it is useless in the fort. Within the bay, on Governor's Island, abreast of the battery is the old red stone fortress, Castle Williams, built in 1807. Its guns also are of the antiquated type, which Secretary of War says would have no more effect on an armored ship than hailstones on a roof. It is obvious that, even with the aid of the torpedo-boats, which would be laid in the event of a hostile fleet approaching our coast, the defences are utterly inadequate to protect the city and the shipping in its docks. Boston, Philadelphia and other ports are still less prepared for defence. It would be possible with the facilities at our disposal to strengthen the defences and equip them with effective guns in the time left to us. Vulnerable at so many points, it is evidently our wisest course to use every means available, consistent with national honor, to avoid war, and happily our negotiations will be with a government having strong reasons on its own account for desiring a pacific solution of the difficulty. With ordinary tact and courtesy there should be no difficulty in securing for Venezuela all her rights without our drawing the sword to enforce them. Amid all the clamor there is for war, the Christian cannot forget that

The fruit of righteousness is sown in peace by them that make peace (James 3:18).

illed in a Bear's Den.

The story of a shocking fatality comes from Sandstone, Minn. A farm was recently established between that town and Superior, Wis., to raise bears and deer for market. Only two men lived permanently on the farm. One of these arrived at Sandstone a few days ago in a deplorable condition. He was burned, and his flesh in many places torn from the bones. He reported that his companion was dead. A fire broke out in the log hut in which the men lived, and soon was beyond control. After vainly endeavoring to extinguish it, the men ran for their lives. Without waiting to secure any weapons, the men dashed through the bear-den, but no sooner were they among the frenzied animals than they were attacked. Both men were thrown to the ground and had to fight for their lives. Nine bears were in the enclosure, and they struggled with each other to get at the prostrate men. The man who escaped saw his companion killed, without being able to render any help, and it was almost by a miracle that he succeeded in crawling through the enclosure alive. The experience of some men in trying to escape from eternal destruction is almost as terrible. When they become alarmed and seek safety, their way is barred by enemies they have themselves nourished. Evil habits and associations hold them back, and many have lost their lives by suicide and murder in the struggle to get free. It still often happens with those who have left the path of honor and virtue, that

A man's foes are they of his own household. (Matt. 10: 36.)

A Suit Over a Dime.

Chief-Justice Fuller, of the United States Supreme Court, pronounced judgment on December 23 in a suit that has gone through all the courts, and has cost over a hundred thousand dollars. The question at issue originally was only about a dime. Mr. James E. Morgan and his wife were on a surface car in Jersey City, N. J., some time ago, and tendered the conductor a dime in payment of their fare. The coin was an old one, a good deal worn with service, and the conductor refused to accept it. As the passengers insisted, and would not pay in any other way, the conductor put them off the car. Thereupon they sued the company for damages, and gained a verdict for a small sum. The company appealed, and the suit was carried from court to court with varying results, until it reached the highest court in the land. Chief-Justice Fuller confirmed the judgment of the original court, and said that there was no provision against the passage of silver coins which were abraded only by circulation, and they were a legal tender so long as they bore the semblance of a coin. We need to keep that principle in mind in dealing with men. There are some so defaced and battered by their own vices and the rough usage of the world, that they seem to have lost their manhood, but they must not be rejected by men on that account, while he who made them is ready to receive them into his kingdom.

Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. (John 6: 37.)

Heroism at a Fire.

A young girl performed an act of heroism at a fire in New York a few days ago, which astonished even the firemen of the city. She and her widowed mother, who is an invalid, lived on the fourth story of a flat house in the upper part of the city. On the day of the fire, she had a little visitor in the person of a girl baby eighteen months old, the beloved daughter of a tenant of the floor below. An errand to a store in the neighborhood called the girl away from home for a short time in the afternoon. Dur-not sufficient to ensure the safety of those helpless ones. They needed personal assistance. It is so with some who are in danger of perishing eternally. They can be saved only by those who know of their danger going to them and helping them to go to Christ for salvation.

Go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in. (Luke 14: 23.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. Stephen Merritt will address the Sunday School of Sterling Place Church near Seventh Avenue, Brooklyn, on January 12th, at 3:30 p.m.

The Christian Endeavor Society of Siloam Methodist Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, has an average attendance of five hundred members at its regular meetings.

One of the latest Christian Endeavor Societies regularly organized and enrolled is a society in the Penitentiary of Santa Fe, New Mexico. The members are prisoners serving their sentences.

Rev. W. Lindsay is Doing an Excellent Work in the Tombs prison of New York, by disseminating good literature among the prisoners. Mr. Lindsay regularly conducts the Episcopal service in the Tombs.

Evangelist C. H. Billings has been Holding services at Norfolk Junction, Neb. The meetings were held in a large hall used by railroad societies. There was a good attendance and a deep interest in the work.

Rev. Grant C. Fuller and Isaac H. Meredith have been conducting union meetings at Vineland, N. J. The Congregational, Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian churches co-operating in the movement. Three hundred persons made profession of faith during the revival.

Fifteen French Priests Have Recently Left the Church of Rome. The Bishop of La Rochelle is much concerned, because one of his own priests, Frederic Bonhomme, had the audacity to preach from his own pulpit on this subject, "Why I leave, and why you ought to leave, the Church of Rome."

The Arrests in New York City last year numbered 112,800. Of the prisoners the males were 62,473; the females, 20,327. Those born in the United States were 49,535; in Ireland, 21,703; in Germany, 11,421; in Italy, 7,236; in Greece, 4,853; in England 2,663; in China, 992. The charges included among others intoxication, 24,820 arrests; assault and battery, 6,031; murder and manslaughter, 19.

A New Jersey Journal reports that Sunday, December 22d, was the first time in one hundred and forty-one years that there was no service in Trinity Episcopal Church, Woodbridge. The cause was a dispute between the Rector and the Vestry which has now been settled. The church was built in 1754.

Rev. Henry Y. Satterlee, Rector of Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church, has finally decided after careful deliberation to accept the Bishopric of Washington to which he was unanimously elected at the Primary Convention of the diocese. Dr. Satterlee has been elected before this to other dioceses, but until now did not feel that Calvary parish was in a condition which would justify him in leaving it.

At the Recent Semi-Annual meeting of the Trustees of the Christian Endeavor Society held in Detroit, the Secretary stated that there are now 42,800 societies, with a membership of 2,568,000. The societies in this country number 34,392, and there are 3,185 in Canada, 3,000 in England, over 1,600 in Australia, and the remainder chiefly in missionary lands.

A series of Afternoon Services were commenced in Cooper Union, New York, on January 6th. Two years ago similar meetings were held there and there was a large attendance and many were converted. The meetings are to be held every Monday at 3:30 p.m. Christian workers are invited to attend and the prayers of God's people are asked for a blessing on the services.

Rev. A. C. Dixon, D.D., Pastor of Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, conducted the service on January 6th. Mr. D. L. Moody has promised to take charge of one of the services.

A Chicago Journal States that this year the saloons of the city will not be so many by nearly two thousand as last year. This is not wholly due to temperance effort but to the fact that the brewers who have carried them find that they are losing by the arrangement.

The Work of Dr. T. J. Barnado in caring for the destitute children of London has received public acknowledgment. At a reception at Exeter Hall he was presented with an illuminated address and a check worth $17,085. This was a personal gift apart from the children's support. Dr. Barnado now has eighty-four homes in which five thousand destitute children are clothed, fed and educated. The expenses are over $700 a day.

The Pope has issued a Letter Warning Roman Catholics against attending the services of Murphy and Fitzgerald, the two Roman Catholic priests who refused to surrender their church when ordered to do so by the bishop of Nebraska. The Pope pronounces their adherents excommunicated from the church while living, and unworthy of Christian burial when they die.

The Rev. Dr. A. T. Pierson is soon to start on a preaching tour in Europe. Beginning at Liverpool, where he labored from January 1st to 5th, Dr. Pierson will visit Wales, the West of England and Ireland during the first three months; and during the next quarter he will travel in Scotland.

THE BREAD OF LIFE.

Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Robert Stuart MacArthur.

Text: John 6: 35: "And Jesus said unto them, I am the Bread of Life; he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst."

THE fifth and sixth chapters of this Gospel are of thrilling interest. They bring us into the midst of those great conflicts which our Lord had with the Jews, and which finally resulted in their determination to put him to death. The Gospel as written by the Evangelist John shows more fully than the other Gospels the reason of their anger against Jesus Christ. Their rage reached the highest point in connection with the resurrection of Lazarus, and was satisfied only when they had crucified the Lord of glory. The miracles recorded in these chapters are given, not so much for their own sake, as because of the discourses to which they gave rise. The Evangelist John records chiefly the miracles which bore a direct relation to our Lord's vindication of his divine mission. The cure of the infirm man at Bethesda subjected Christ to the charge of having violated the Sabbath; and this charge gave him opportunity to declare his equality with the Father. The miraculous supply of bread which is recorded in the sixth chapter, gave our Lord the opportunity to discourse on himself as the Bread of Life.

We have in the immediate context both Christ's miracle and Christ's sermon thereon. The miracle of the feeding of the thousands prepares the way for the discourse on the Bread of Life. The text for this morning is a part of Christ's explanation of his great miracle. He himself is the teacher; let us sit at his feet and learn the words of wisdom which fall from his grace-anointed lips.

Significant Title.

We notice, in the first place, that Christ calls himself the Bread of Life. This is a significant title. It will well repay a few minutes examination. It is significant as related to the world's great need—bread. This is the cry that has come evermore from the world's troubled heart, and from its angry or beseeching lips. This cry has reddened streets with blood, has made thrones tremble and has changed the destiny of nations. It is the world's cry to-day. Men say that they must have bread for themselves and for their children. But this cry for the bread which perisheth is but a symbol of the world's need of the Bread of Life which satisfies the soul. Thousand of weary men and women are longing for the Bread of Life even though they have never rightly interpreted their own despairing cry. They have been perishing with hunger, while in their Father's house there was bread enough and to spare. They have tried to satisfy the soul's hunger by the things of this life, but it has refused the bribe, and has continued to utter its cry. The soul cries out for God, and will be satisfied with nothing short of himself. It is man's honor and glory that nothing short of God can satisfy his soul. Beasts are satisfied with things; but a living man needs the living God.

The title is significant also as related to Christ's preparation to supply that need. The manna in the wilderness was a prophecy of this true bread. The people to whom Christ was speaking designed to disparage the miracle which he had wrought. They compared it to its disadvantage with the manna which had been furnished to their fathers in the wilderness; but our Lord most skillfully turned their objection into an argument in support of his claims. The manna which their fathers had received was received from heaven. Can Christ substantiate his claim to be the Messiah by a greater miracle? That manna was supplied for the space of forty years; but, they seem to say, you have furnished but a single meal. The manna was from heaven; but the bread which you gave was only of the ordinary character. Your miracle, therefore, seems to be vastly less important than was the miracle of Moses. Our Lord's reply corrects two errors in their statement. It was not Moses who gave the bread in the wilderness, but God; and the bread then given was perishable, but the bread which Christ furnishes endures unto everlasting life. Our Lord then proceeds to affirm that he is the true bread. That he had come down from heaven to give his life unto the world; that his great mission was to restore men to the favor of God and to supply the wants of their nature.

The term is significant also, as illustrative of Christ's relation to creation in all its departments. Jesus Christ is the heart of the physical universe. It is he which gives it significance and glory. He is its Creator, Preserver, and Ordainer. He has distinctly taught us that, "All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made." He is and light. Without him creation is meaningless, life is lifeless and heaven is charmless. Science has clearly taught us that life can come only from life; and beyond this statement science has not yet gone. Jesus Christ affirms that he is the source of all life, that in him resides the vivifying power by which life is given to the universe. Sublimar statements than these were never uttered. The world has only begun to apprehend the glory there is in Jesus Christ. The man who is without God and without hope is an orphan in the great universe. To him the world is robbed of its significance.

Christ teaches us, in the second place, that as the Bread of Life he must be appropriated. Bread is nourishing only as it is eaten. It might be an interesting exercise for you to-day, when you go to your homes, to make a chemical analysis of the bread upon your tables. You might thus discover its constituent parts in their due proportions. Submitting a piece of bread to a microscopic examination would doubtless be an instructive exercise, but in the meantime you might starve with hunger. Bread, to be helpful, must be masticated, digested and incorporated. It must become a part of our bone, muscle and blood. It must become an element in our life by personal appropriation. Men are unspeakably foolish who would refuse to eat bread, because there are difficulties connected with the growth of grain, and its transformation into bread, which they cannot understand. Even if they could solve all these perplexing problems, as an intellectual exercise, the solution would be valueless, so far as the support of the body is concerned, if the bread were not appropriated. It is astonishing that men will act so stupidly regarding the bread of heaven, who act so sensibly regarding the bread of earth. Christ is to the sustenance of the soul, what ordinary bread is to the support of the body.

The appropriation of this bread is first represented in the text by the words, "Cometh to Me." Coming to Christ is appropriating Christ. We have been alienated from him by sin, but the Spirit draws us back to Christ by the cords of heavenly love. Christ himself said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." The word "religion" is, according to some authorities, from a Latin word, meaning, to go through, to gather, to collect, or to go over again in thought, in reading, or in speech; but according to others, it is from a word meaning to "bind back, to bind fast." The thought in this last derivation is that the soul by sin has been separated from God and from men, and when divine grace comes into the heart, it is bound back and bound fast to God and to men. This is a blessed thought in connection with true religion. When we come to Christ the previous alienation ceases, reconciliation is completed, and heart and soul are bound again to God never to be separated from him. Coming to Christ is the motion of the heart toward its true centre. Many are near in body, but are remote in heart. True faith is not simply the assent of the head, but it is also the consent of the heart. Jesus Christ invites us to-day to draw near to him in humble confession and in Holy Confidence.

He exhorts, beseeches, and commands us to give him our hearts, and to surrender to him the control of our lives. We never know true joy until we have come into this trustful relationship with Jesus Christ.

The appropriation of this bread of life is further taught in the words, "believeth on me." Coming to, and believing on, Christ are the personal reception of all the blessings of his salvation. "Believeth" is parallel with "Cometh" of which we have just spoken. In the 29th verse of this chapter we are taught that the work of God is believing on him whom he hath sent. Faith in Christ lies at the foundation of true Christian character. Faith is the root, out of which springs the plant of obedience and the fruit of service. Faith in Christ is a fundamental characteristic of all his true disciples. Such disciples are rightly called believers, because of the dominant influence of faith in their Christian experience. This faith is not simply in Christ as the Saviour of the world at large, but it is an individual faith in Christ as a personal Saviour. It is the acceptance of him as Lord and Master, and the surrender to him in loving and loyal obedience of all our powers and possibilities.

Christ teaches us, in the third place, that this bread when appropriated gives full satisfaction. He distinctly affirms that "he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst." Only this bread can satisfy the wants of our immortal natures. Many men are hungry and thirsty for the honors of this world, even though they know that these honors cannot fully satisfy the wants of their deeper natures. Christ satisfies the mind of man—his intellectual nature. We cannot but sometimes utter the ancient plaint, "Oh, that I knew where I might find him." Creation tells us much of God. But its voice is often silenced, and when heard is often misunderstood. Providence speaks in authoritative, but occasionally with vague meaning. Too often might makes right. Faith at times loses its footing amid the sifting sands of experience. The heart cries out as of old, "Lord, show us the Father and it sufficeth us." Jesus Christ comes at that point and reveals God as that fear him, and as a mother who comforts those who trust him. The mind reaches out after the infinite; it cannot be satisfied with the things of time and sense. It seeks perfection, infinity, eternity. Man is not a beast that perisheth. He is made in the image of God. Blessed be God, he completely fills the mind of the profoundest philosopher and the lowliest child who bows penitently in reverent worship. Intellect finds its highest joy when it prostrates itself in reverence at the feet of Jesus Christ. The Magi, bending low before the infant Christ, teach us one of the noblest uses of the highest intellect. The greatest scholars of to-day are worshippers of the lowly and the lofty Christ. The mind never finds its own highest possibilities until it finds God as the object of its noblest desires.

The appropriation of Christ as the Bread of Heaven satisfies the heart. We were made both to love and be loved. He is more or less than man who does not desire to give and to receive love. But nothing short of God can fill the heart of man. No other object is worthy the supreme affection of a human soul. It has been well said that if you give a man half the world, he would cry out for the other half; and it has been better said that if you gave him both halves, he would still be without complete satisfaction. You can never fill a circle with a triangle; no more can you fill the heart of man with anything human. A man may be burdened with the gifts of earth, but they never can entirely fill his soul. Apart from God, his heart will be continually desiring and never at rest.

Christ also satisfies the conscience. A wounded conscience who can bear. The sacrifices on ten thousand altars proclaim the conscience's need for forgiveness and peace. Men are conscious of sin and their need of an atonement that they may find acceptance with God. No words can too strongly express this deep need of the soul. It gives the only explanation to the efforts that men have been making in all ages and countries to find rest from their sense of guilt. Jesus Christ has furnished the satisfaction which the soul needs. He has died the Just for the unjust that we might be brought to God. He gives a peace so profound that no storm of earth can ever disturb its sweet repose. He keeps in perfect peace those whose minds are stayed on him. The rest which he gives to the conscience is like music which fills the soul with unutterable joy; it is like the calm sunset of a summer Sabbath: it is love reposing on the bosom of its Lord; it is the joy which is a foretaste of the glory and blessedness of heaven.

A Brahman Convert's Trials.

IN a letter from Poona, India, Rev. R. P. Wilder relates the story of a Govind Maryan Bhide, a young Brahman convert who was subjected to persecution by his fellows. After baptism Govind tore off his sacred thread—laying aside his caste. After a lecture Govind appeared and begged the privilege of addressing the Brahmans. He spoke with wonderful courage, "Christ has saved me, I am ready to die for him. You can do what you wish to me." It was like throwing a lighted match into a powder magazine. One kicked him and another went to the length of spitting in his face. Poor Govind was weeping, and on my asking him the reason, came the reply, "I do not mind their kicking me, but it was hard to have them spit in my face." I told him that our Lord was thus treated, "and they spat upon him, and took the reed and smote him on the head."

Two Brahman students delighted us. One said to Govind, "You did right." Another said to me, "You must be glad to see the fruit of your preaching. More may be converted. I am ready to be, if convinced." During singing in our room one cried out in honor of the god, "gum pati." He was promptly removed. The there was comparative quiet inside, but large crowd gathered outside. I went down and spoke to them and quieted them somewhat.

A student brought me his Bible and said, "Keep it, please; the crowd down on the street is tearing up Bibles after snatching them from the members of the class. They will tear mine unless you take charge of it." I put his Bible in my bag the lights were extinguished, the door locked. As I was feeling my way down the stairs, a Brahman inquirer whispered, "Be careful, Mr. Wilder." It was sweet to have his friendship at such a trying time, even though he was so timid. On reaching the street I went up to the crowd remarking that there was a larger number outside than in, and asking the meaning of the gathering. One said, "We are advising all students to keep away from your rooms. It is our duty to do so." replied, "None need come if unwilling to come. At the beginning of our work we said so, did we not?" "Yes," was the reply. Then a student pushed another into me and something about the size of croquet ball flew past my face. Then spoke to the crowd. "You are doing nothing new. For 1800 years Christians have been persecuted. We rejoice that you are counted worthy to suffer dishonor for Christ's sake. If your purpose is to persecute us, do so. We are ready and willing." The crowd was quiet while I spoke, and I believe one said, "We have nothing against you." Moorhead and I went to our tonga (carriage). One cried "Break the tonga;" another threw a stone against the tonga and we drove home. Of course we know not what will take place. Pray for us, that we may be constantly filled with the Holy Spirit and speak God's Word with boldness.

Four-Footed Pets.

Little Dorothy Drew and her Dog—A Strange Choice of Pets—The Tiger and his Little Companion.

It often happens that childhood derives a very large share of its happiness from the society of animal pets, of whom almost all children are very fond.
Ponies, dogs, goats, cats,
rabbits, pigeons, squirrels, birds of many different sorts, are among the most familiar of such pets, but some children have such a love for animals that they extend their acquaintance among the wild denizens of the wood and grove, with wonderful success.

The love of animals is a great aid to the development of the child-nature, its exercise bringing courage, kindness, generosity and many other good qualities into constant play. It is not an uncommon sight to witness a great, shaggy mastiff or Newfoundland, yielding ready obedience to the will of a child, who may be little more than a baby. Attachments of this character are often wonderfully strong.

Little Dorothy Drew, the granddaughter of ex-Premier Gladstone of England, has a special playmate—a black Pomeranian spaniel, named "Petz." The two are almost inseparable. Dorothy, who is six years old, runs about barefooted on the carpeted floors at Hawarden, where her distinguished grandfather resides, and "Petz," who now is eight years old but as nervous and frisky as ever, trots by his little mistress's side, as faithful as her shadow.
"Petz" shares her troubles and her delights, barking and leaping with joy when Dorothy laughs and drooping his ears and tail in gloom when she mopes in the corner or has a pouting fit—which even the best children do have at times.

Very different from the tie of affection that bound Dorothy and her spaniel was the singular companionship of a young tiger and a terrier puppy, as shown in one of our illustrations. They romp, eat and sleep side by side. Thus the roughest and wildest nature may be made gentle and tender through sympathy and affection.

Truant Children Found Out.

A peculiar service was rendered to the London School Board by a pair of monkeys lately. In one of the school districts too many parents reported no children in their families, and in order to ascertain the real number of children in the district, the school officers resorted to an ingenious measure. Two monkeys were gayly dressed, put in a wagon, and, accompanied by a brass band, were carried through the streets of the district. At once crowds of children made their appearance. The procession was stopped in a park, and the school officers began their work:

distributing candies to the youngsters, who watched the monkeys' antics. The po-

Another pleasant amusement is "an adjective letter party." The framework is a letter to be written by one of the number describing some recent event or familiar occurrence, possibly the entertainment in progress. As many names are introduced as is possible and each is preceded by a blank to be filled with an adjective.
The writer asks for an adjective from each member of the circle in turn to fill the space. These are, of course, ludicrously inappropriate and when the whole is read aloud it calls forth peals of merriment.

Swiss Child Toboganners.

In a pleasant article in Scribner's, W. R.
Leigh describes the manner in which the hardy Swiss children enjoy winter sport in the snow at St. Moritz. He writes: Swiss tobogganning, when properly managed, can provide riding of every kind, for young and old, for strong and weak alike. And of what endless merriment have these same small runs at St. Moritz been the scene! Matches have there been decided upon rocking-horses; there clipper-sleds and double-rippers, pigstickers, and bobsleys, fearful wildfowl of all sorts and kinds may be described of a fine afternoon sliding round "Caspar's Corner" toward society you would find real pleasure. When the invitation comes, you express your pleasure that Dick or John is to be married, and hope that he may be happy. And that is the end of it. You do not send a present, or, what is better—and often costs more—a friendly note conveying your congratulations and good wishes. The occasion passes without any sign from you, and you have lost an opportunity of identifying yourself with your friend's happiness. He will not associate you with that epoch of his life, and very likely will resent your silence. It is the same when you neglect to take note of a friend's afflictions. It is a real effort to write a letter of sympathy. But such a note may mean much to one in trouble, and by it you can bind a heart to your own with a hook of steel.

Russian Home Life.

CUSTOMS and costumes change slowly in Russia. Old usages, some of them good and others bad, are maintained almost rever-entially. Russian law considers a betrothal as valid as a marriage, and the breaking of an engagement is severely punished. "The Russian man," says the proverb, "does not love his wife if he does not beat her." "Love your wife as you love your your soul, and shake her like an appletree." "Beat your wife once before dinner and once before supper." The dog is more reasonable than a woman, for he never growls at his master.
These sayings indicate a few of the usages that are now coming to be regarded as abuses, but which it will require many years to eliminate from Russian home life.

The Russian lower classes are not thrifty.
They do not earn much; and their money is spent in the celebration of the numerous holidays and namesdays. On these occasions tea is drunk in such quantities that a looker-on might be alarmed. On holidays this article never leaves the table, and friends and relatives are invited "pitj tschai," to drink tea. The lower classes drink tea out of tumblers, and they drink it without sugar, mostly with jam and lemon. A person who has perhaps not tasted meat far weeks will not hesitate about spending the little money he has on tea of the best quality and dainties that go along with it.

Value of Home Music.

In bird life, one of the partners sings, but in the human family the gift of song is well-nigh universal. Music should play a much more important part in home life than it usually does. It certainly would promote health and happiness. Husband and wife, if they have musical talent, should cultivate it all their lives long, have teachers occasionally at least capable of keeping their voices well drilled to the later years of life. The time some men spend in idle talk, and which some women fritter away, if given to music, would produce good effects on the health, and be at the same time a very important means of education.

A Poet on Domestic Happiness.

The late Oliver Wendell Holmes once said that his idea of perfect happiness was when four feet were on the fender. During the later part of his life, a friend, coming in and finding him in a dejected state of mind, asked: "What is the matter, my friend?" Mr. Holmes looked up with a look of sorrow, and said: "Don't you see? There are only two feet on the fender now." How much of the happiness of the marriage relation is suggested by his idea, so touchingly expressed, and the pathos of the aftertime? It seems startling to think how much may be perhaps unheedingly done by ourselves to destroy our fireside happiness.

lice took their names and addresses. They found that over sixty parents kept their children from school. The ingenious measure brought to the school about two hundred boys and girls.

A Pretty Parlor Game.

In devising means for the amusement of the young folks during the winter evenings, a new game is suggested by a writer in the Toronto Christian Guardian. The game is called "Recognition." One is chosen to be the host, and sent into a room by himself. The others unite in dressing up and disguising one of their number. A broom, a pillow, and a sheet is used to help make taller or larger, and to cover the whole dress. The right hand alone is to be left exposed. The dressed-up guest then calls upon the host, who guesses his visitor, of course shaking him cordially by the hand. If he cannot recognize by the hand alone, the host might ask three questions, which the guest must answer, disguising his voice if he choose. The host has but one chance, and if he guesses correctly, the caller "becomes the host," the former host taking his place.

the shores of the frozen lake. Swiss nurses, carrying babies in their arms, career down
the snowy road, hotly pursued by infants, hardly larger than the babies, and jauntily astride of tiny hand-sleighs no bigger than a biscuit box. Several ladies flash past on a Canadian, balanced by the swaying foot of their young guide, who sits behind them, leaning on his side and looking over all their shoulders as he steers. There is a perpetual swing and flash of movement and bright color; a ring of laughter in the frosty air; while the warning cry of "Achtung" echoes from every corner, as the rattling sleds go by, and more keep coming upward from below to start again.

Losing Friends.

One of the facts that most people wake up to when they are approaching middle age is, that they have lost a good many friends through their own carelessness.
You receive an invitation to the wedding of one whom you knew well eight or ten years ago. He has quite passed out of your life; though, if you were living near each other, so that you would meet occasionally, he is the kind of a man in whose Secret of Strong Life.

uggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Jan. 19
Luke 7: 19-28.

IN trying to get the people to analyze their motives in going out into the wilderness to see and hear the Baptist, Christ incidentally suggested the qualities that go to make up a strong life. What made John an object of interest to the people? It is doubtful whether his hearers grasped Christ's meaning. Like much of his teaching, it was designed to set them thinking, rather than to enunciate dogmatic truth. He wanted them to ask themselves why John was sought and followed. He said nothing about him that was held in high esteem. If he had been a weak, wavering nature, graceful and yielding, loved by every new current of religious thought, they would not have gone a journey to see and hear him. There were plenty of teachers of that kind at home. It was the force and vigor of the man that attracted them. They had a great respect for wealth and luxury, yet they were going out to see a man who held both in contempt. Why did they want to see him? He was not a man of the popular type. Did they go because they thought he was a prophet? They were right; he was the greatest prophet who had ever appeared. Then he made the startling statement that the humblest member of the kingdom he had come to set up was greater than John. So we come upon a very weighty truth. Christ held that in his kingdom there was power and opportunity for development beyond any that John had attained. The difference brought about by Christ's revelation was so great that it placed the youngest beginner ahead of the finest product of the old dispensation. The statement has a pertinence for us that we may well consider. We know that such mighty changes are possible. Newton's discovery of gravitation so affected scientific research. The key he put in the hand of the youngest student, opened the door for him to the treasures of knowledge far more precious than had been accessible before. The invention of the telescope was another step of the same order. The student, equipped with the new instrument, was a greater power in research than the greatest astronomer who had passed away ignorant of it. So in the spiritual life, Christ puts within reach of his followers power that gives them a vantage ground above and beyond that accessible to all who had gone before. To every man desirous of living the higher life, this fact is full of meaning. The greatness of Socrates and Plato, of Elijah and Isaiah, may be surpassed. If they had possessed the knowledge and the life imparted by Christ, what could they have been! If the power placed in our hands can do so much, what may we become! The thought is full of stimulus. Here is the secret of true greatness. Emerson's notion of yoking the wagon to a star is frivolous compared with his idea of humanity in connection with divinity. We have seen it in operation, but we have never seen all that it is capable of doing. There is not a poor drunkard emancipated from his chains, nor a vicious man become virtuous, who is not an example of this power. The result may not be much to boast of, but think of the material! What must that power be that can do so much with so little! We see the flaws in the statue, but what genius what must be that could produce it even as it is out of such clay!

TO THE RESCUE.

ONWARD Christians, to the rescue!

Wherefore stand ye idly by?

Hear ye not the sound of conflict?

Hear ye not the battle-cry?

'Tis your Master who is calling,

Hasten, for the help is late.

'Tis your brothers who are falling,

Dying for the Christian faith.

Not to take a mighty city

In the battle's deadly glare.

But with hope, and love, and pity,

To your brothers in despair.

Oh, ye parents, tender-hearted.

With the loved ones round your hearth,

Think of those who now are parted

From the ones they love on earth.

Think of those by misery driven

Where the Turkish Crescent waves!

Hear the cry that goes to heaven

From Armenia's mountain caves!

'Tis a cry that must be heeded

By the Christians everywhere;

Oh, your help is sorely needed,

Give it with your love and prayer.

The Prophecy on the Mount.

The Double Application of Our Lord's Predictions Recorded in Matt. 24.

BY REV. RICHARD CHESTER, A.B.

THIS memorable prophecy, spoken by him who "spoke as never man spake"—who is himself the source and sum of all prophecy, to whom "give all the prophets witness"—cannot be otherwise than specially interesting and instructive; more so we may well believe, than any other which the sure Prophetic Word contains.

I take it for granted that this prophecy comprises predictions such as he alone "who knows the end from the beginning" could utter, both concerning the then future, but now long since accomplished, destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman army under Titus, with preceding and attendant events; and that it also contains predictions most explicit and emphatic concerning the yet future Second Advent of the Lord Jesus Christ. That we are justified in taking this view and rejecting the theory that the prophecy was fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem is evident from one passage in the prophecy (verses 30, 31): "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn; and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory; and he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather his elect together from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." To affirm that in any event which happened at, or in connection with, the destruction of Jerusalem there was a fulfilment of these words; or to affirm that any event other than the actual coming of the Lord from heaven could possibly fulfil them, is to invest this prophecy in particular, and all prophecy in general, and all the words, prophetic or otherwise, which the Lord Jesus Christ, the utterer of these words, has spoken, with a character of exaggeration, and of a consequent vagueness and uncertainty belonging rather to the fabled oracles of the heathen Sybil than to the Holy Oracles of the God of truth.

While thus maintaining the comprehensive and double character of this memorable series of predictions—features in which they resemble a large portion of Old Testament prophecy, I would desire altogether to disclaim the possibility of making anything like an exact division in it, and affirming, as some commentators have done, that so much belongs exclusively to the destruction of Jerusalem, and that the remainder belongs altogether to the Second Advent of our Lord. I have met with many attempts to establish such a division, and they each and all have seemed to me to be utterly unsuccessful.

The true, and therefore by far the easiest and simplest, mode of interpreting the strictly prophetic portion of Matthew 24, I believe to be this—that it refers in its entirety to two great events, the one of which is the type, the other the antitype; the general scope and tenor of the prophecy includes both, and refers to both, although in some instances more immediately to the one than to the other. The strictly prophetic portion of the chapter to which these remarks apply, terminates, it will be observed, at verse 35. The sequel of the chapter, with the entire chapter 25, belongs to the hortatory and practical, rather than to the exclusively prophetic, portion of the teaching of our Lord.

JOE MOSELEY came hurrying up from Wheeler's to get a verification of the report, and the first person he met was Will who happened to come out of the house just as Joe came up. "Good-mornin', Billy," the "bummer" greeted. "Is it true that your father is dead?"

"No, it is not true, Joe," was the answer. "He appears to be a little better this morning. The doctor says he has about an even chance, now."

"Well, I'm mighty glad to hear that. Seein' the barroom closed, folks took it that he must be dead. I s'pose it was the noise that bothered him, and it's right; but a feller is lost without your barroom."

"Yes, I suppose so."

"And, say, Billy, they do tell that you have come home to stay."

"Yes, that is true, Joe. Father needs me now, and my duty is right here. I am here to stay."

"Good for you, boy!" with a slap on the shoulder. "I knowed you would come out all right, yes, sir, I did! All they had to do was let you alone and let you run to the end of your rope; ha! ha! ha!"

"That was all, Joe."

"And you are goin' to run the house?"

"Yes; but I won't open right away. We are going to overhaul and do some repairs, soon as father gets better. It will take quite a little time."

"Then you think he will get well, eh? Well, now, that's good. I wish you the best of success, Billy, and I'll drop in and see how you get on, of course; seems like home to me here."

"Yes, you will be welcome, Joe."

So it was that Joe hastened back to Wheeler's fairly running over with news, and the report went out that Billy Hilton was going to take charge of the hotel and carry on the business. And those who were in the secret did not deny the report; in fact, they confirmed it—with mental reservation.

Reuben Hilton improved, slowly, though he still remained blind, and when he was able to sit up the work of repairs and alterations was begun. The enclosure was removed from under the piazza, plate glass windows were put in—barroom and poolroom alike, and these rooms were thoroughly renovated, refitted and refurnished. The house, meantime, was painted a clean, snowy white, with green shutters.

And then, finally, came the day of the re-opening.

CHAPTER X.

God Helping Him.

It was now winter.

Snow fell during the night, and on the morning of the opening day there was about a foot of snow on the ground.

The sky was heavy and threatening, and Will Hilton, rising early and looking out, was strongly reminded of that other winter's morning when he had gone forth to begin the new life.

It seemed like old times, to get up early and go down and open the house; but how different was everything below!

Instead of a bare floor with sawdust sprinkled over, there was a heavy marble-block oilcloth on the floor of the barroom; but the big stoves were still in their places, though standing no longer in boxes of sand, but upon zincs.

A few of the old chairs remained, and there was still the bar, if anything more showy than before. A handsome long plate mirror had been put in against the wall behind it, and on a shelf just in front of the glass was a splendid display of elegant glasses of different kinds. On the bar stood three large silvered urns, with lamps underneath. There were no bottles.

In the pool-room the alteration was even more marked. The pool-tables were gone, and in their places stood large, roomy reading-tables, well supplied with all the better class of periodicals of the day. Here the floor was carpeted, and there were two handsome book-cases on either side, each filled with the choicest literature. And then there were games; chess, checkers, parcheesi, etc., but no cards or dominoes. The chairs were all easy, large, and inviting. In the barroom, again, there were, some small tables where a meal could be served at short notice outside of regular hours. And last of all, because "the first shall be last," over the bar was this motto:

GOD HELPING ME.

Will hurried around, soon had the fires glowing with all their old-time cheerfulness, and the silvered urns upon the bar were presently steaming, and the grateful aroma of rich coffee pervaded the rooms.

He had just finished, and everything was in order, when the door opened and in shambled Joe Mosley, stamping the snow from his worn-out boots in his usual manner, and Will greeted him cheerily, much as he had heard his father greet him a hundreds times before.

"Hello, Joe; glad to see you! So you are my first caller on opening day, are you?"

"Mornin', Billy. Yes; thought I would drop around and start you off."

"Well, got your dime for your morning dram?"

"Yes, I have got it, but I had to borrow it out of the old woman's pocket before she woke up. She got paid for some washin' yesterday, and I happened to know it, you see."

"Well, step up here and let me see if I can't tickle your palate."

Will went behind the bar and busied himself with something just under the bar where Joe could not see.

"You ain't quite as quick as you used to be," Joe complained; "but, I s'pose you have got your hand out. Hang it! but you are fixed up fancy here; looks like I had got into the wrong shop!"

"No, you are in the right place, Joe."

"And is that coffee I smell? It sort o' makes my mouth water."

In a few moments Will set before his surprised customer not a glass of rum! but a plate containing two pieces of nice toast, with a fresh poached egg on each, and a cup of steaming coffee.

"There, Joe," he said, "put that under your vest and see how it will make you feel."

"But, Billy, I—I can't pay for all this; I only—"

"It is only ten cents, Joe."

"Ten cents!"

"That is all; and you needn't pay me either; this is opening day, and this is my first treat. See how you like it."

He supplied a knife and fork and pepper and salt, while speaking, and the old toper fell to eating with a will, giving his stomach a surprise it had not had in many a day, at that hour of the morning.

And while he ate he comprehended the full meaning of Will's coming home to stay and his management of the hotel.

"Well, well! but that was good!" he exclaimed, when he had done, wiping his mouth upon his sleeve. "Much obliged to ye, Billy, I must go right down and tell Wheeler about this."

"Hold on, Joe, I have something to say to you, first," said Will, detaining him, "I want you to come here and work for me."

"Work for you—me?"

"Yes; I want you to keep this room clean, the chairs in order, and do other little chores around. Besides, I hear you are going to lose your little home next spring, and we can give your wife something to do, too. The fact of the whole matter is, you may both come here and make your home with us."

And they came.

Thus was the hotel opened anew, with God's blessing upon the endeavor. Lack of space precludes much more that might be told in detail. It was a success from the very first, and was soon the popular resort of all the young people of the village, of both sexes—for the parlors had been fitted for the use of ladies upon a similar plan, and Will's mother and sister presided over them.

In both the barroom and parlors refreshments suited to the seasons were served; in summer the house was filled with the better class of people who came out from the city to spend a few weeks or months in the country, and its fame became more than merely local. Reuben Hilton recovered his health, to a degree, but not his sight, although the physicians held out hopes that it might be restored as his health continued to improve. Perhaps it was as well; he could not see daily and hourly, that white scar upon his son's cheek.

Among the most constant patrons of the place were Fred Wilson and his widowed mother. It was just such a resort as Fred's soul had longed for. To him it was Eden without the serpent. Meanwhile, Wheeler's license having expired, and he being unable to get a renewal, so strong was public sentiment, the other hotel had been forced to shut its doors; and so was the curse of rum entirely removed from lovely Silvervale. And yet the village did not lack an excellent hotel where strangers could stop and feel at home. A few of its old patrons shunned it, of course; but their loss was more than made up by the increase of patronage. About the only thing that remained as formerly, was the sign, which still swings from the arm of the pole at the corner—

What a New Testament Did.

From a missionary in Russia comes an account of the wonderful way in which a copy of the Hebrew New Testament was used. An old Jew, eighty-two years of age, was found lying on a straw bed; he was visited by a Christian missionary, who, knowing him to be a Jew, kept repeating to him verses from the Old Testament. After listening about an hour he said: "These are beautiful words from the Old Testament, but I know a medicine better than all these, one that heals all wounds. 'The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth from all sin.' He was asked to explain how he came to know this truth, and he drew from the straw on which he lay a worn-out copy of the Hebrew New Testament. Two years before, while traveling, he had stayed over night in the hay-loft of an inn, and there he found the book, which had been left by a Hebrew traveler. His son had already been converted through it, and the whole family were rejoicing in the truth.

Mrs. Jamal's Syrian Class.

IN a letter from Jerusalem, dated Dec. 3, 1895, Mrs. Jamal gives the following interesting information regarding the progress of her Training School for Young Syrian Girls. She writes: "Five of my girls have already begun to earn their own living, by what they have learned since they came to the class. One girl goes out once a week as a laundress, another for ironing two days, another for scrubbing and cleaning. In another house two girls go for cutting and sewing three days in the week, (of course not during the two days of the class). The ladies who hired them gave me favorable accounts of them, and have promised to recommend the girls to friends, for good behavior and honesty."

"One of the girls when she first came to the class, got from me some silk needle work to do at home. When finishing her work, she said no more silk threads remained. I believed what she said, but after a few weeks I found out that she had stolen some of the silk and worked with a piece of lace and sold it to one of my friends. On discovering this I took the matter as the subject of our morning prayers (Matt. 16: 26), and explained to the girl the meaning of that passage. After prayers each girl took her work, but this girl did not move from her place. She followed me to my room and knelt down and confessed that she had stolen the rest of the silk I gave her, and said she was very sorry for her great sin and ready to bring the money which she had received (which was not more than fifty cents). My heart was touched by the tears she shed and as she asked me to pray with her that God might forgive her, she promised to be honest in the future."

"I have watched her for several months and have confidently introduced her to work to the house of one of my intimate friends and am glad to say I have a very good account of her."

"My four Armenian girls are again attending the class. I was glad to hear that when they were kept at home lately at the Governor's suggestion they spent their time profitably. I am sure it will delight the hearts of our friends to hear their report. The eldest girl said, 'Although we were prevented from coming to the class but gathered with our class-mates in spirit. We have not neglected our prayers, nor the reading of the chapters and verses, and sang the hymns. Then some of us took again the Scripture stories that we learn from you. Our mothers and the neighbors used to meet with us. The neighbors regretted our coming back to the class. They said, 'you have been a great comfort to us, these bad days.'"

The Italian Waldenses.

an interesting article on the Waldenses in Italy, published in The Christian, O. Golia Mauro writes: Turin was the town in which the Waldensian Missions were first started, in 1120, as soon as the Vaudois received religious liberty through Charles Albert. It was through General Beckwith's help that we were enabled to build our beautiful church here. Every Sunday morning from 400 to 600 assemble to listen to the Gospel. In addition to these regular attendants, the Gospel has been preached by two pastors there to more than 5,000 Roman Catholics in one year. We have in Turin nearly 400 communicants, ninety scholars in the day-school, and 112 in Sunday-school; and the contributions to the church have amounted to 3,500 francs in a year. One of the Waldensian pastors who works in Turin is Signor Ribetti. He was one of the three Protestant pastors who, at the time of Pius IX., were chosen to sustain—against a commission of cardinals in the Vatican—the decision as to whether St. Peter ever went to Rome as first pope, as the Romish church teaches. Pastor Ribetti is our able lecturer against the errors of Romanism. Some little time ago, Trione, one of the most eloquent priests of Turin, challenged a public discussion with whatever pastor would accept it. Immediately Pastor Ribetti wrote saying he would do it. Seeing that things were thus becoming serious, the priest, Trione, drew back and refused; but Pastor Ribetti gave his answer all the same, and for several evenings our church contained more than 800 Roman Catholic listeners. In connection with the church in Turin, we have a Y.W.C.A., which is called the "Society of Sisters," who have done work for the poor to the amount of 1,130 francs. Another society, called the "Banner of the Gospel," is a very flourishing Y.M.C.A.

A Sceptic Enlightened.

occasionally happens that great talent and genius stands in the way of the soul's enlightenment. It is related of Overbeck, the celebrated painter, that he was an avowed sceptic previous to his study of the Bible, which was undertaken merely for the sake of preparing himself for the execution of his famous painting, "Christ's Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem." When he first read the story, there was no tender, reverent acknowledgment of the Messiahship of Jesus, only a cold, critical survey of his journey from Bethlehem to Jerusalem. And yet as he perused it, something of the beauty and grandeur of the narration grew upon him. Jesus was returning from Bethany, where he had raised Lazarus from the dead, and as Overbeck pondered upon the event, the same majesty and authority of the divine command, "Lazarus, come forth!" impressed him with its awful power. Thoughts of the possible divinity of the Master came to his awakened conscience. And as they neared the city it was the office of the Holy Spirit to reveal to his lone heart the melting tenderness of the Saviour. A simple recital of the majesty and pervading love of Jesus was sufficient ransom a soul. How intensely, how joyfully he worked, and how excited he came as the eager faces of the multitude followed Jesus, grew under the swift strokes of his skilful brush. Faithfully, nobly had Overbeck executed his inspired task, and long did he gaze upon the divine humanity he had so beautifully painted, until the great heart of unutterable love and meekness which he had truly depicted touched his soul, and he upon his face with the agonizing cry, "Oh God, forgive!" That moment he was free and became a true believer.

The First and Only Dwarf Sweet Pea,—Burpee's "CUPID"

GROWS ONLY FIVE INCHES HIGH! THE FLORAL WONDER OF THE AGE!

A POT-PLANT OF CUPID.—From a Photograph.

CUPID is the greatest novelty ever known in flowers, and has won the highest possible honors in Europe. We had plants grown in pots exhibited at the meeting of The Royal Horticultural Society, in London, England, where, by unanimous vote of the Committee, it received An Award of Merit—the highest honor that can be conferred upon a new variety. We also exhibited in Paris, France, on July 11, 1895, at the Société National d'Horticulture, where it received a First-class Certificate, as a distinct novelty of surpassing merit.

DESCRIPTION.—The foliage is very dark green; blossoms pure waxy-white, of unequalled substance, and full size. The plant does not grow over five inches high, and never more than twelve to fifteen inches in diameter. The stems are about four inches long, bearing two or three blossoms, all very near the end of the stem. It is a wonderfully free bloomer, and begins to flower as early as May and continues until November.

In regular-size packets (each containing twenty seeds), per pkt. 25 cts.; five pkts. for $1.00; twelve pkts. for $2.00, postpaid, by mail, to any address.

In half-size packets (ten seeds each), per pkt. 15 cts.; two pkts. for 25 cts.; ten pkts. for $1.00.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

THE CRY OF ARMENIA.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: II. Kings 19: 37, "They escaped into the land of Armenia."

IN Bible geography this is the first time that Armenia appears, called then by the same name as now. Armenia is chiefly a table-land, seven thousand feet above the level of the sea, and on one of its peaks Noah's ark landed, with its human family and fauna that were to fill the earth. That region was the birth-place of the rivers which fertilized the Garden of Eden when Adam and Eve lived there, their only roof the crystal skies, and their carpet the emerald of rich grass. Its inhabitants, the ethnologists tell us, are a superior type of the Caucasian race. Their religion is founded on the Bible. Their Saviour is our Christ. Their crime is that they will not become followers of Mahomet, that Jupiter of sensuality. To drive them from the face of the earth is the ambition of all Mohammedans. To accomplish this, murder is no crime, and wholesale massacre is a matter of enthusiastic approbation and governmental reward. The prayer sanctioned by highest Mohammedan authority, and recited every day throughout Turkey and Egypt, while styling all those not Mohammedans as infidels, is as follows: "O Lord of all creatures? O Allah! Destroy the Infidels and Polytheists, thine enemies, the enemies of the religion! O Allah! Make their children orphans and defile their bodies: cause their feet to slip; give them and their families, their households and their women, their children, and their relatives by marriage, their brothers and their friends, their possessions and the race, their wealth and their lands as booty to the Moslems, O Lord of all creatures!" The life of an Armenian in the presence of those who make that prayer is of no more value than the life of a summer insect. The Sultan of Turkey sits on a throne impersonating that brigandage and assassination. At this time all civilized nations are in horror at the attempts of that Mohammedan government to destroy all the Christians of Armenia. I hear somebody talking as though some new thing were happening, and that the Turkish government had taken a new role or tragedy on the stage of nations. No, no! She is at the same old business. Overlooking her diabolism of other centuries, we come down to our century to find that in 1822 the Turkish government slew 50,000 anti-Moslems, and in 1850 she slew 10,000, and in 1860 she slew 11,000, and in 1876 she slew 10,000. Anything short of the slaughter of thousands of human beings does not put enough red wine into her cup of abomination to make it worth quaffing. Nor is this the only time she has promised reformation. In the presence of the workshops at the mouth of the Dardanelles, she has promised the civilized nations of the earth that she would stop her butcheries, and the Eastern and Western hemispheres have been enacted of believing what she says, when all the past ought to persuade us that she is only pausing in her atrocities to put nations off the track and then resume the work of death. In 1820 Turkey, in treaty with Russia, promised to alleviate the condition of Christians, but the promise was broken. In 1839 the then Sultan promised protection of life and property without reference to religion, and the promise was broken. In 1844, at the demand of an English minister plenipotentiary, the Sultan declared, after the public execution of an Armenian at Constantinople, that no such death penalty should again be inflicted, and the promise was broken. In 1850, at the demand of foreign nations, the Turkish government promised protection to Protestants, but to this day the Protestants at Stamboul are not allowed to build a church, although they have the funds ready, and the Greek Protestants, who have a church, are not permitted to worship in it. In 1856, after the Crimean war, Turkey promised that no one should be hindered in the exercise of the religion he professed, and that promise has been broken. In 1878, at the memorable treaty of Berlin, Turkey promised religious liberty to all her subjects in every part of the Ottoman empire, and the promise was broken. Not once in all the centuries has the Turkish government kept her promise of mercy. So far from any improvement, the condition of the Armenians has become worse and worse year by year, and all the promises the Turkish government now makes are only a gaining of time by which she is making preparation for the complete extermination of Christianity from her borders.

Why, after all the national and continental and hemispheric lying on the part of the Turkish government, do not the warships of Europe ride up as close as is possible to the palaces of Constantinople and blow that accursed government to atoms? In the name of the Eternal God, let the nuisance of the ages be wiped off the face of the earth! Down to the perdition from which it smoked up, sink Mohammedanism! Between these outbreaks of massacre the Armenians suffer in silence wrongs that are seldom if ever reported. They are taxed heavily for the mere privilege of living, and the tax is called "the humiliation tax." They are compelled to give three days' entertainment to any Mohammedan tramp who may be passing that way. They must pay blackmail to the assessor, lest he report the value of their property too highly. Their evidence in court is of no worth, and if fifty Armenians saw a wrong committed and one Mohammedan was present, the testimony of the one Mohammedan would be taken and the testimony of the fifty Armenians rejected; in other words, the solemn oath of a thousand Armenians would not be strong enough to overthrow the perjury of one Mohammedan. A professor was condemned to death for translating the English Book of Common Prayer into Turkish. Seventeen Armenians were sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment for rescuing a Christian bride from the bandits. This is the way the Turkish government amuses itself in time of peace. These are the delights of Turkish civilization. But when the days of massacre come, then deeds are done which may not be unveiled in any refined assemblage, and if one speaks of the horrors, he must do so in well-poised and cautious vocabulary. Hundreds of villages destroyed! Young men put in piles of brushwood, which are then saturated with kerosene and set on fire! Mothers, in the most solemn hour that ever comes in a woman's life, hurled out and bayoneted! Eyes gouged out, and dead and dying hurled into the same pit! The slaughter of Lucknow and Cawnpore, India, in 1857, eclipsed in ghastliness! The worst scenes of the French revolution in Paris made more tolerable in contrast! In many regions of Armenia the only undertakers to-day are the jackals and hyenas. Many of the chiefs of the massacres were sent straight from Constantinople to do their work, and having returned, were decorated by the Sultan. To four of the worst murderers the Sultan sent silk banners, in delicate appreciation of their services. Look at this picture. It is a copy of a private letter from Armenia: "Rev. Grigos Hachadoovian, a minister of the Gospel, whom I knew personally was the pastor of the 2d Congregational Church of Kharpoot, my native city. When the Turkish soldiers commenced shooting all over the city he took his wife and children and went to the church, soon about sixty of his congregation joined him. Naturally good and earnest Christians as they were they lifted their voices up to heaven for help. While in prayer the Turks rushed in and demanded of the minister to become a Mohammedan then and there, with his congregation. He refused promptly. The Turks removed the pulpit, made a butchering platform, cut off the head of the minister and actually cut him to pieces before his congregation. Mind you on the platform from which he had preached Christ for twenty years. This horrible spectacle seems to have had no effect upon the devout Christian Armenians, as they all refused to denounce Christ and pray to Mohammed and all were killed in the church to the last man, woman and child." What do you think of that picture, Christian people of America? That is the Mohammedanism some people would like to have introduced into our country.

Five hundred thousand Armenians put to death or dying of starvation! This moment, while I speak, all up and down Armenia sit many people, freezing in the ashes of their destroyed homes, bereft of most of their households, and awaiting the club of assassination to put them out of their misery. No wonder that the physicians of that region declared that among all the men and women that were down with wounds and sickness and under their care, not one wanted to get well. Remember that nearly all the reports that have come to us of the Turkish outrages have been manipulated and modified and softened by the Turks themselves. The story is not half told, or a hundredth part told, or a thousandth part told. None but God and our suffering brothers and sisters in that far-off land know the whole story, and it will not be known until, in the coronations of heaven, Christ shall lift to a special throne of glory these heroes and heroines, saying, "These are they who came out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb!" My Lord and my God! thou didst on the cross suffer for them, but thou, surely, Oh Christ! wilt not forget how much they have suffered for thee! I dare not deal in imprecation, but I never so much enjoyed the imprecatory Psalms of David as since I have heard how those Turks are treating the Armenians. The fact is Turkey has got to be divided up among other nations. Of course the European nations must take the chief part, but Turkey ought to be compelled to pay America for the American mission buildings and American school-houses she has destroyed, and to support the wives and children of the Americans ruined by this wholesale butchery. When the English lion and the Russian bear put their paws on that Turkey the American eagle ought to put in its bill.

Who are these American and English and Scotch missionaries who are being hounded among the mountains of Armenia by the Mohammedans? The nobles and women this side of heaven. Some of them, men who took the highest honors at Yale and Princeton and Harvard and Oxford and Edinburgh. Some of the women, gentlest and most Christlike, who to save people they never saw, turned their backs on luxurious homes to spend their days in self-expatriation, saying good-by to father and mother, and at ward good-by to their own children circumstances compel them to send little ones to England, Scotland or America. I have seen these foreign missionaries in their homes all around the world, a stamp with indignation upon the little blackguardism of foreign correspondents who have depreciated these heroes and heroines who are willing to live and die for Christ's sake. They will have the best thrones in heaven, while their defeat will not get near enough to the shagates to see the faintest glint of any of the twelve pearls which make up twelve gates. This defamation of missionaries is augmented by the dissolute English American, and Scotch merchants who to foreign cities, leaving their families behind them. Those dissolute merchant foreign cities lead a life of such gross morals that the pure households of the missionaries are a perpetual rebuke. Sardis never did believe in doves, and there is anything that nightshade has is the water lily. What the five hundred and fifty American missionaries have suffered in the Ottoman Empire since it leave the archangel to announce on day of judgment. You will see it reason that I put so much emphasis on Americanism in the Ottoman Empire when you that America, notwithstanding all disadvantages named, has now over 2 students in day-schools in that empire 35,000 children in her Sabbath Schools that America has expended in the Turkish Empire for its betterment over $10,000. Has not America a right to be heard? it will be heard! I am glad that indignation meetings are being held over this country. That poor, weak, arduous Sultan, whom I saw a few years ride to his mosque for worship, guard 7,000 armed men, many of them mounted on prancing chargers, will hear of sympathetic meetings for the Armenians if not through American reporters, through some of his 360 wives. What do with him? There ought to be some Helena to which he could be exiled, the nations of Europe appoint a ruler of their own to clean out and take possession of the palaces of Constantinople. To this august assemblage in the capital of the United States, in the name of the Nations, indict the Turkish government for the wholesale assassination of Armenia, and invokes the interference of Almighty God and the protest of Eastern and Western hemispheres.

But what is the duty of the Sympathy, deep, wide, tremendous, immediate! A religious paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York, has led the way with munificent contributions collected from its subscribers, and these are now being faithfully distributed to American missionaries in Turkey. But the Turkish government is opposed to the relief of the Armenian sufferers, as personally know. Last August, before any idea of becoming a fellow-citizen of you Washingtonians, $50,000 for Armenian relief was offered me if I would personally take that relief to Armenia. My passage was to be engaged on the Paris, but a telegram was sent to Constantinople, asking if the Turkish government would grant me protection on such a grand of mercy. A cablegram said the Turkish government wished to know the points in Armenia I desired to go with relief. In our reply, four cities were named, one of them the scene of what had been the chief massacre. A cablegram came from Constantinople saying that I had better send the money to the Turkish government.

let's mixed commission, and they would distribute it. So a cobweb of spiders produced a relief committee for unfortunate people! Well, a man who would start up through the mountains of Armenia with 15,000 and no governmental protection could be guilty of monumental foolhardiness. The Turkish government has in every possible way hindered Armenian relief. Where is that angel of mercy, Clara Barton, who appeared on the battlefields of Fredericksburg, Antietam, Falmouth, Cedar Mountain, and under the blaze of French and German guns at Metz and Paris in Johnston's floods, and Charles's earthquake, and Michigan fires, and Russian famine? It was comparatively of little importance that the German Emperor decorated her with the Iron Cross, for God had decorated her in the sight of all nations with a glory that neither time nor toady can dim. Born in a Massachusetts village she came in her girlhood to this city to serve our government in the Patent Office, but afterward went forth from the office of that Patent office with a Divine warrant signed and sealed by God himself, to heal all the wounds she could touch, to make the horrors of the flood, and the pestilence and plague, and hospital fly her presence. God bless Clara Barton! Just as we expected, she lifts the banner of the Red Cross. Turkey and all nations are pledged to respect and defend that Red Cross, although that color of cross does not, in the opinion of many, stand for Christianity. In my opinion it does stand for Christianity, for was not the cross under which we put of us worship red with the blood of the Son of God, red with the best blood that was ever shed, red with the blood shed out for the ransom of the world? Then lead on, oh, Red Cross! and let Clara Barton carry it! The Turkish government is bound to protect her, and the warriors of God are twenty thousand, and their charioteers are angels of deliverance, they would all ride down at once to overthrow and trample under the hoofs of their white horses any of her assailants. With the five hundred thousand dollars she has laid at her feet! Then may the angels that carry her across Atlantic and Mediterranean seas be guided safely by the angels who trod into sapphire pavement beyond Galilee! Upon soil incarnadined with martyrdom let the Red Cross be planted, until every demolished village shall be rebuilt, and every pang of hunger be fed, and every wound of cruelty be healed, and Armenia stand with as much liberty to serve God in its own way as in this the best land of all the earth, the descendants of the Puritans and Huguenots, are free to worship the Christ who came to set all nations free!

It has been said that if we go over there and interfere on another continent, that will only give the right for other nations to interfere with affairs on this continent, and so the Monroe doctrine be jeopardized. No, no! President Cleveland expressed the sentiment of every intelligent and patriotic American when he thundered from the White House a warning to all nations, that there is not one acre or one inch more of ground on this continent for any transatlantic government to occupy. And by that doctrine we stand now and shall forever stand. But there is a doctrine as much higher than the Monroe doctrine as the heavens are higher than the earth, and that is the doctrine of humanitarianism and sympathy and Christian helpfulness which one cold December midnight, with mud and multitudinous chant, awakened the shepherds. Wherever there is a wound it is our duty, whether as individuals or as nations, to balsam it. Wherever there is a knife of assassination lifted it is our duty to ward off the blade. Wherever men are persecuted for their religion it is our duty to break that arm of power, whether it be thrust forth from a Protestant church or a Catholic cathedral or a Jewish synagogue or a mosque of Islam. We all recognize the right on a small scale.

If going down the road, we find a ruffian maltreating a child, or a human brute insulting a woman, we take a hand in the contest if we are not cowards, and though we be slight in personal presence, because of our indignation we come to weigh about twenty tons, and the harder we punish the villain the louder our conscience applauds us. In such case we do not keep our hands in our pockets, arguing that if we interfere with the brute the brute might think he would have a right to interfere with us, and so jeopardize the Monroe doctrine. The fact is that that persecution of the Armenians by the Turks must be stopped, or God Almighty will curse all Christendom for its damnable indifference and apathy. But the trumpet of resurrection is about to sound for Armenia. Did I say in opening that on one of the peaks of Armenia, this very Armenia of which we speak, in Noah's time the ark landed, according to the myth, as some think, but according to God's "say-so," as I know, and that it was after a long storm of forty days and forty nights, called the Deluge, and that afterward a dove went forth from that ark and returned with an olive leaf in her beak? Even so now, there is another ark being launched, but this one goes sailing, not over a deluge of water, but a deluge of blood,—the ark of American sympathy,—and that ark, landing on Ararat, from its window shall fly the dove of kindness and peace, to find the olive leaf of returning prosperity, while all the mountains of Moslem prejudice, oppression, and cruelty shall stand fifteen cubits under. Meanwhile, we would like to gather all the dying groans of all the five hundred thousand victims of Mohammedan oppression, and intone them into one prayer that would move the earth and the heavens, hundreds of millions of Christians voices, American and European, crying out, "O, God Most High! Spare thy children. With mandate from the throne hurl back upon their haunches the horses of the Kurdish cavalry. Stop the rivers of blood. With the earthquakes of thy wrath shake the foundations of the palaces of the Sultan. Move all the nations of Europe to command cessation of cruelty. If need be, let the warships of civilized nations boom their indignation. Let the Crescent go down before the Cross, and the Mighty One who hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written 'King of Kings and Lord of Lords,' go forth, conquering and to conquer. Thine, O Lord, is the kingdom! Hallelujah! Amen!"

Mission Work in Natal.

In Natal, South Africa, there are 477,000 Zulus, as well as 41,000 Indians. Many missionaries are doing and have done a good work, but these people have not, by any means, been all reached.

"In Zululand," says the South African Pioneer, "we have now facing us a population estimated at about 150,000 Zulus. In spite of missionary efforts, there are parts entirely unevangelized, where the Gospel has never been preached. Two districts north of our station on the Lucia Lake, have tens of thousands of Zulus and no missionary. In our missionary's (Mr. Olsen-Feyling) diary, we have a heart-stirring appeal to plant native Evangelists in this fever district where a white man can only reside during the winter. Our hearts yearn to enter these open doors. Join us in 'praying the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers into the harvest.' Densely populated Amatongaland is still without a missionary; and we hear the white man's vices have already swept away or ruined a great many of this nation. Although a fever country, it can be reached; and we feel if traders can face this climate for the sake of gold, surely God's children can go forth to seek the precious souls of those who are in such dense heathen darkness."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

Out-Door Work Among Italians.

Sunday Morning Open-Air Services in the Italian Quarter of New York City.

FEW more varied and picturesque experiences have fallen to the lot of a city missionary in the metropolis of a civilized nation, than those encountered by Agostino Dassori, who for a number of years has proclaimed the Gospel among the Italians of lower New York. There are in the great city altogether almost two hundred thousand Italians, of whom fully one-half are crowded together in dense masses in the tenements and alleys of the lower part of town. Almost all are intense, though ignorant, Catholics. Yet it is declared by those who have done missionary work among them, that no other class of emigrants yields such rich spiritual results in the same length of time.

Mr. Dassori relates his experiences among his fellow countrymen here as follows: "Shortly after my conversion in 1882, I became impressed with the fact that I must present the Gospel of Jesus Christ to my fellow-countrymen. I commenced my Christian work as a Sabbath School teacher in the Mariner's Temple on Henry street, where I was led to seek Christ, and immediately began to take a deep interest in all kinds of religious work. I prayed earnestly during that period that God would open some way by which I could reach the Italian people, and some time in the year 1887 I was called by Mrs. M. B. Willard of New York to take charge of a little Italian mission in Crosby street. I began with a congregation numbering about ten people, and in less than four months had an attendance of about eighty. Until 1893 I continued holding services every Sunday, and spreading the Gospel among my people. In November, 1893, I received a call from the New York Baptist City Mission to assume charge of the Italian work at Mariner's Temple, corner of Oliver and Henry streets, in lower New York, and in a district where over 25,000 of my people reside. We started this new mission with only thirteen in attendance at the first meeting. On the following meeting it was increased to seventy-five. At the first Sunday in January, 1894, there was an attendance of one hundred and forty. From the beginning until the present time, our people have manifested a great desire to have the simple Gospel of Jesus Christ, and at our principal meeting on Sunday afternoons at 4:30 we have a very large audience. Our Thursday evening service has an average from sixty to a hundred. The Sunday School session is well attended. The dear Lord not only gives us a good number of listeners, but we feel that his Spirit has also been with us. Forty-two of our countrymen have been baptized, and many are following Christ. People who worshipped images and saints are giving up their idols and confessing Christ, who alone can make intercession for all sinners. Many prejudices against Protestantism are disappearing, and the outlook is most cheering, although we have to contend with great opposition from the Roman clergy. We need for the continual prosperity of this work, the prayers and sympathy of our American friends. Some, judging the Italians from the low class that come to these shores (although these people need the Gospel as much as any one else), have felt an absurd prejudice about my countrymen, and have thought it useless to evangelize them. We could easily prove that money and effort in the Italian work pays the most. In lower New York we have about 100,000 Italians, and as they are going to stay here, it is the duty of every American Christian to care for the spiritual welfare of these people who have been kept in darkness, superstition and ignorance."

About four months after commencing his work at Mariner's Temple, and while passing through the Italian district, Mr. Dassori became strongly impressed with the idea that it was his duty to go into the highways and byways, and there preach Christ to his people. The first meeting was held in Cherry street with a good attendance. The people listened with deep reverence, removing their hats as a token of respect every time the name of Christ was mentioned. The next meeting was held on the corner of James and Oak streets, the Catholic quarter. In a few minutes over one hundred people were listening to the preached Word. These meetings (one of which is pictured in the illustration on the first page), have been kept up with unfailing regularity and have been productive of much spiritual good.

On many different occasions the out-door services have been interrupted by Catholic disturbers, who objected to the doctrine preached. Broken fruit and even stones have at times been thrown at the evangelist by those among his auditors who were bitterly opposed to Protestantism. But, even in the face of such obstacles, progress was noted and conversions recorded. Mr. Dassori tells of the following among many other interesting cases:

"About two months ago an Italian young man of intelligent appearance came to our meetings. He told us without being asked that our religion was 'too simple,' and therefore we could not expect to proselyte among people that were brought up in a religion that had so much attraction like the Roman Church. The young man would not stop to argue, and as he was going out we invited him to come again, and perhaps he would be convinced of the truth of the 'too simple' religion of Christ. He came steadily to the meetings, and three weeks ago, after confessing his sins and the pardon received from Christ, he said he was 'astonished at the wonderful love of God.'"

Mr. Frank Dickerson, Vice-President of the New York City Baptist Mission, speaking recently of the work, said: "Our Italian Mission is two years old. Last month the attendance of the Italians at the services was 1420. While great care has been exercised in receiving candidates, yet nineteen recent conversions and baptisms are reported, and twelve now desire baptism."

"A remarkable fact in our membership is that in many cases those who made public confession of faith in Christ were, in one instance, four of one family, father, mother, and their two daughters; in another, father, mother, and one daughter; and in still another, father and son. Another family, on account of some illness, vowed to St. Gennaro an amount for masses and candles. Before the sick man had thoroughly recovered from his sickness, he attended one of our services in the Temple, and after having listened, with rapt attention, to the Word of God, he was convinced that Christ is the only mediator, believed in him, and broke his vow to St. Gennaro. A poor old woman that used to keep, day and night, a lamp burning before some image, when she heard the second commandment, she destroyed the lamp and broke the image and to-day she does worship Christ in spirit and in truth. In reaching the Italian, we reach people who have utterly no religious belief at all, or else those who have been educated as Roman Catholics, and yet it will be noted that the number of conversions among the Italians is greater than among either the English or the Hebrews."

Other work of a missionary character among the Italians includes a mission meeting at Franklin street and the Italian Mission at Five Points and several others of lesser magnitude but all laboring for the same glorious purpose—the bettering of humanity and winning souls for Christ.

The Early Ministry of Jesus.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 26. Luke 4: 14-22. Golden Text Luke 4: 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE have already seen how our beloved Lord went through a preparation for his ministry, as all true workers for God must, that they may be fitted for their vocation. His first and brief course of study was the Word of God, and in a former lesson we have seen what proficiency he had made in this, even as a boy of twelve. But having passed his impromptu examination in the Word of God in the temple at Jerusalem as a Child, the Lord Jesus, although he must have been filled with the Holy Ghost more than John the Baptist was from his birth, yet must have a special anointing for his ministry. When he was baptized by John the heaven was opened and the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily form, as a dove upon him, and a voice came out of heaven, "Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased." But our Lord, even when full of the Word and full of the Spirit, was not yet ready for his ministry. Oh, how many fail just here! They have gained the knowledge of God's Word; they have consciously received the Holy Ghost, but they have been in such a hurry in serving God, that they have hurried through times of testing with impatience at being thwarted, and have proved by this very thing, how little the Word of God, which they have learned, dwells in them richly in all wisdom, and how little root the Holy Spirit had taken in their being, seeing that the fruits of the Spirit are not manifest in them. Christ's obedience to his parents, after the incident at Jerusalem, was a proof of the power which the Word had in his life, his conquest of the devil in the temptation in the wilderness was a proof how the Spirit could use the Word in his circumstances and make him more than Conqueror.

To Do Something

We are only what we prove to be under a test. No blessing that we receive is permanent until it has been tested. The Lord Jesus went up full of the Holy Ghost into the wilderness, "led of the Spirit," to be tempted of the devil, but he returned in the power of the Spirit after he had passed through the testing. And then it was that he "began to preach, and to say the kingdom of heaven is at hand," he gathered disciples and "went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease, and all manner of sickness among the people" (Matt. 4: 17-25), and a great impression was made; "he was glorified of all" (Luke 4: 15). But this was not to continue. With him, our good Shepherd, who, when he putteth forth his own sheep goeth before them (John 10: 4), it must be as it should be after with his own which are in the world. (John 13: 1.) He went to Nazareth where he had been brought up, not by accident; he did not choose his own way, but let himself be guided. (Isa. 1: 4, 6.) There is no place so difficult to most of us as the place where we are best known, for there we are apt to meet the most with what is personal on the part of others. Here the Lord Jesus did just as at other places; he went into the synagogue, where as a child he had listened with intense attention to the Scripture. He stood up to read, and having found the 61st chapter of Isaiah, read only to the second verse: then he rolled up the parchment, gave it to the man in charge, and sat down. His heart was very full. Those who had learned and labored with him when a boy were present.

He Knew His Audience.

"And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him." The report of his preaching and his wonderful works had reached Nazareth, but there was something in his reading of that Scripture just there, where he was born, which meant a tremendous decision on the part of all who were present. Often had he read those words: He knew they applied to him, but how bring others to believe it? Now, however, his ministry had commenced; he had preached good tidings to the poor, he had healed the broken-hearted, he had preached deliverance to the captives, the blind were receiving their sight, the sad ones, bruised by sin and sorrow, and sickness, were being set at liberty, the jubilee, the went against the popular opinion of the day, it would not Suit their Purpose!

Alas! alas! this is the real state of mind with many, the question is not with them, "Is this the truth of God?" but, "Does it suit my purpose?" A spiritual Messiah, did not flatter their pride; if they should receive him, they would be despised with him, this they could not accept, and so they rejected him! But Jesus must leave a testimony behind him, and he left them a message from the Word of the living God. How often have Christian workers been despised, and they have let wounded personal feeling show itself in words full of asperity, and such is the testimony left behind them! It is safe to fall back upon the Word of God, and this Jesus did.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

SOME uncertainty exists about the period of our Saviour's life to which the incident of the lesson belongs. Luke's way of mentioning it, would lead us to infer that it occurred immediately after the temptation, but from the narratives of the other Evangelists, it would appear that there was an interval of a year between the two events. Luke makes no mention of the miracle at Cana, of the visit to Jerusalem, when Christ talked with Nicodemus, and of other events which John records. The question arises whether these events occurred before or after year of going free, was being preached—would any of his own fellow citizens believe on him and be blest?

It was his first; and was to be his last appeal to Nazareth, and he spoke plainly, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears," I am he who fulfills it, was the plain meaning. Such an appeal had not been made in any other place. The people of Nazareth knew him, his spotless life, his intense love for the Scriptures, and now they heard of what he had taught, and of the works he had wrought in the neighboring country. But instead of weighing the Scripture, they fell back on their prejudices and gave way to personal feeling. It was not the question with them: Does he, or does he not, fulfill this Scripture? That question would have easily been answered in the affirmative. But in their hearts was the thought, "Would such a Messiah suit us?" And so they said, "Is not this Joseph's son?" Had they pursued their own question farther they might have come to the knowledge of the truth. But prejudice gained the day, and the Lord saw that the people of his own city were the first to reject their Messiah: "He came unto his own and his own received him not." (John 1: 2.)

He saw what was passing in their minds. Their curiosity was stirred; they would like to have seen him do works of healing amongst them, they would like to be able to glory in a remarkable fellow citizen, "Whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do here in thine own city!" But to acknowledge him, so lowly-born, a mere mechanic, as the Anointed, the Lord's Christ,—this was asking too much. It er the visit to Nazareth. The evident expectation of the Nazareth people that Christ would do some mighty work there, appears to be decisive evidence on the point. Christ had evidently done some mighty works, otherwise the Nazareth people would not have looked for them. It is therefore a fair inference that between the thirteenth and fourteenth verses of this chapter, there was an interval of about a year of which Luke gives no history. Jesus had apparently remained at Nazareth working quietly at home until his thirtieth year, when he went to Judea to be baptized by John. The temptation in the wilderness followed, and on his return he preached and taught and worked miracles, went up to Jerusalem to keep the Passover, and spent some time at Capernaum. He was evidently at this time a prominent teacher and when he appeared in the Synagogue at Nazareth, which doubtless he had attended as a boy, his dignity was recognized. Galilee was the northern district of the kingdom, embracing the regions allotted at the time of the division of the land by Joshua, to Issachar, Zebulun, Asher and Naphtali. It was some two thousand miles in area (about the size of the State of Delaware), and in Christ's time is said to have had a population of about three millions. The opening of the work was not encouraging. The Nazareth people listened in astonishment to his words, but when they heard him apply Isaiah's predictions to himself, they were indignant. Doubtless to them it appeared unwarrantable presumption. They could not believe that one brought up among themselves should be the focus of prophecy. But they wanted to see a miracle performed and Christ was unwilling to gratify their curiosity. He did not want to be regarded as a mere wonder-worker. He justified his refusal by the example of Elijah and Elisha who did their wonders among strangers. Their disappointment culminated in tumult and they grew murderous in their fury. Christ narrowly escaped from ending his ministry then and there.

As his custom was. Christ set an example in this as in other matters. If he had it his custom to go to the synagogue on the Sabbath day, surely we, who can help more than he did, might wisely make it our custom, too. A minister says: "I wish my people were like Christ in this." At our last service there were many whom I would have expected to see there. I thought they might be sick, so the day I went around to pay a pastoral visit. One lady was out. She did not go to church the day before, her husband told me, because it was slippery and she was afraid of falling. It was still slippery, to-day she had been obliged to go out, she had fixed a strip of rag around her boot to keep her from slipping. Another did not come because he was tired with week's work, so he had passed the morning napping and had taken a long walk the afternoon. None of the absentees were sick, but each had a reason more or less satisfactory for not being at church on Lord's day."

To preach the Gospel to the poor. "Where are you doing down here?" a business man asked of a friend, a clergyman, whom he met in a squalid street, full of tenement houses. "I am about my business," was the reply. "But I thought your church had moved up-town, as most of its members now live in the better part of the city." The clergyman assented, "Yes," he said, "the church has moved, but it is here that I am most needed, and here I spend most of my time. I should not let my Lord's words to be disproved through my negligence. He said, 'The poor hear the Gospel preached to them.' The business man nodded approval. He said, "I must often wish you could feed them, as your Lord did. If you meet any urgent cases, I wish you would let me share your work, on that side of it," and thrusting a bill into his friend's hand, he bade him good-by.

To heal the broken-hearted. Macaulay quotes from Ariosto a quaint legend of a good fairy who was able to bless with good gifts whomsoever she would. She could give money to the needy, could prosper to the merchant, health to the sick, safety to people in peril, and whatever they most needed to every one. But she did not give to all indiscriminate; she only gave to those who deserved, and she was furnished with a means of testing the dispositions of all who sought her help. At certain seasons she lost her beauty and had to take on a foul and miserable shape. When she thus disguised some people beat her; she pelted her with stones, and some trod upon her. A few were kind to her, protected and helping her. When she resumed her normal shape she sought out all who had been kind to her, and on them bestowed her gifts. In these practical days we do not believe in fairies, but we believe in what she said, "Inasmuch as ye did it to these, my brethren, ye did it unto me."

He closed the book . . . and sat down. That was the custom in the synagogue. The preacher stood up to read and then sat down to preach. Christ did not finish the passage, which in our versions is Luke 4: 1, 2. He went on to say, "This is the Scripture fulfilled in your ears." A long interval, already over nineteen hundred years, was to elapse before the clause of the passage should be fulfilled. That clause reads: "And the day of vengeance of our God." In the year 1690 a proclamation was sent through the Highlands of Scotland, that everyone who had been guilty of rebellion against the constituted government would be pardoned before the last day of the year, he should lay down his arms and promise to cease rebellion. Many did so; but one named Maclean put off submission week to week, always intending to submit before it was too late. But when, at last, he started to accept pardon, he was deterred by a great storm and did not arrive until the time had expired. The day of pardon had passed and the day of vengeance had come; Maclean and his were put to death.

SIX NEW RELIEF STATIONS OPENED.

The Armenian Relief Fund's Work of Succor Extended to Erzeroum, Harpoot, Diarbekir, Erzinjian, Mardin, and Gemarek—Faithful American Missionaries as Distributors.

In accordance with the programme indicated in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the work of our Armenian Relief Fund has been extended to several new centres of suffering, and the present writing the following Relief stations are in operation, and affording much needed aid to large numbers of destitute Armenian families:

Locations.	Appropriation from Fund.	Missionary-Relieving Agents.
Van, $10,500		Dr. Grace N. Kimball, Mr. & Mrs. Reynolds, &c.
Erzeroum, 1,000		Rev. W. N. Chambers
Erzinjian, 1,000		and Mrs. Chambers.
Harpoot, 1,000		Rev. H. N. Barnum, Rev. C. F. Gates, Rev. Egbert S. Ellis.
Diarbekir, 1,000		Rev. A. N. Andrus.
Mardin, 500		Rev. J. L. Fowle,
Gemarek, 500		Kaesarea.

These localities, and especially the first one on the list, are without doubt the scenes of greatest suffering in Armenia at the present time. Trebizond has not been included, as, being near the sea-coast, it is more easily reached by relief from Russia. Van (where Dr. Kimball and her associates are busily conducting what has become under their hands, the fund's most extensive relief work) is a focus of distribution which attracts to itself the helpless and bereaved Armenian women and children from over a hundred villages. One of the photographic illustrations on this page (which was forwarded by Miss Kimball from Van), is an actual scene taken from life, and showing the crowd of famishing Armenian refugees that besiege the doorway of the Relief Station at all hours, waiting for bread to appease their own and their children's hunger. Rags, emaciation, and misery are the predominant features of such a gathering. There are probably 50,000 to 75,000 idle and destitute victims of Turkish persecution in Van to-day. Over 1500—mostly in families—are being cared for daily in that city by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Fund. At Erzeroum, where 1200 Armenian Christians were massacred, Erzinjian, where 700 perished under the cruel Turkish swords, Diarbekir, where 6000 Christians were slaughtered by the Sultan's order, and Harpoot, where 900 were immolated, the need of the wretched survivors is beyond description.

The massacres at Mardin and Gemarek (as related in last week's issue), have resulted in leaving the survivors in those once populous villages in a condition that threatens to exterminate them by starvation. The help which has been cabled to them from the Fund will be welcomed with a gratitude that can hardly be expressed in words. With the horror of their recent woes still unrelieved, the aid now extended will seem as if heaven-sent. Erzeroum is still full of wounded, and rows upon rows of blackened ruins alone show where its homes once stood. There are many hundreds homeless. Harpoot, too, has a large number exposed to hunger and cold. At Diarbekir the destitution is probably worst of all, for both in the city and villages, the slaughter was relentless, and the survivors had nothing to expect but death by slow degrees—their little ones perishing of hunger and cold beside them. At Erzinjian, were many martyrs fell, the remaining Christians are scattered around, hiding where they may, like hunted wild beasts. All who can be reached will at least be fed and kept alive by the Fund, through the kindly offices of the missionaries.

Through U. S. Minister Terrell at Constantinople, comes the welcome intelligence that the Turkish government has at last officially consented to permit the distribution of relief to the Armenian sufferers.

This removes the last obstacle to the free operations of our American missionaries who, until now, have been conducting the relief work in the face of official opposition, and at the greatest personal risk. In view of this encouraging news, it is now proposed to open, as soon as possible, additional Relief Stations at Bitlis, Aintab, Urfa, and Sivas, where there is great destitution. These new stations will all be manned by American Board missionaries. This method of extending the operations of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Armenian Relief Fund will be followed as rapidly as the contributions are received. We hope, with the co-operation of our readers, who are personally interesting themselves in this great Christian work, to be enabled to open new stations every week, until the crisis of Armenia's troubles has passed, and the suffering people are no longer in danger of dying from cold and hunger.

In writing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the extension of the relief work, Rev. Judson Smith, Secretary of the American Board of Foreign Missions (after explaining that the money appropriated for the new stations is promptly transmitted by cable to the General Treasurer of the A.

sought refuge in the church. Our cousin also has been killed. Of our three families, only one family has partly a shelter, but we have not even a piece of a blanket to cover our nakedness! We have nothing to eat. The government is giving a small piece of bread for each living person. No physician has been left. Our child has not a book to study from or to read. Everything has been destroyed. They have plundered even the goods which were concealed in the ground. There is no life for us here. In our three families, there is not a lamp to give light. For God's sake send help or else we will die of starvation.

A letter from a young man in the same town to an Armenian in New York, says:

You have no doubt heard of the terrible events that have taken place in our town. They have not left anything in our house. They killed your brother and sister. They have burned our stable and wood-house and our winter house. We are in terrible distress. We have no bedding, no clothes. We have not even the means to procure a piece of dry bread. Rich and poor are all alike, and our generous neighbors are not any better off than ourselves, so that they cannot help us. No merchant or broker has been left.

In a report sent by the Armenian prelacy of Harpoot to the Patriarch of Constantinople, a distressing picture is drawn of the condition of affairs in that city and vicinity. It encloses a list of the murders and plunderings in the diocese; fifty-three Armenian villages and the colonies of Oola and Kusowa have all been destroyed, and the inhabitants plundered.

Churches have been destroyed and holy vessels crushed, and many Christians killed. Of these many were martyred for the faith, and some were compelled to embrace Mohammedanism. The remaining people are famishing and in the direst distress. They have visited our residences, and with imploring cries have begged for refuge and for

Mrs. Sangster on Armenia.

She Appeals to the Women of America to Come to the Relief of the Starving Mothers and Children of Armenia.

DEAR Sisters and Friends:—As I sit down to write to you this crisp winter morning, the air around is still melodious with the echoes of the Christmas greetings and Christmas songs. Our hands are burdened and our hearts are glad because of the gifts and kind words and good-will that came again in universal expression and acknowledgment of the spirit of Christmas.

But in sharp and sorrowful contrast with our joy, another picture rises to my mind's eye. In the midst of the cheer and the music, a wild wailing clamor, in fierce, insistent, jarring undertone, penetrates to my ear. There is a land, over the sea, where among their mountains dwells a gentle-natured soft-voiced people, pastoral in occupation, keepers of sheep and tillers of the ground, as were the shepherds who knelt at the manger. Always from the very earliest days these people have kept the pure faith. Christians surrounded by idolaters, they have never wavered, these simple-hearted Armenians, in their allegiance to Jesus of Nazareth. For this reason, and for this only, Islamism, the religion which sweeps all opposers away in wars of extermination, seeks to efface Armenia and Armenians at the edge of the sword. Burning villages, homeless peasantry, unborn babes carried on the points of fiendish spears, maternity assaulted, virgins ravished, children trampled under foot, old age harried, the cry of those who are threshed with the flail of Satan, though they are God's wheat—these make their solemn appeal to American Christians at this glad season. Starved, beaten, naked, in deaths oft, suffering as only the utterly destitute and desolate can, these people, our brothers and sisters, faint and perish, and their weakness and their misery challenge our pity and our aid.

What can we do? We can pray night and day for the speedy downfall of the unspeakable Turk. We can awake from our torpor and shake off our inertia, and hate Islamic despotism as it deserves to be hated. We can deny ourselves and give our money to relieve the wretchedness which cannot be alleviated except by the contributions of Christians. This is not charity. We are not merely bestowing alms on the poor, when we send bread and clothing and silver and gold to Armenia. We are only paying a just debt.

These, our brethren, standing for Christ, refusing to trample on the cross, declining to yield an iota in the face of persecutions as relentless and cruel as any of the first three hundred years of the Christian era, are giving us so heroic an example of loyalty and love, that we owe them generous support and assistance.

And, while the tragedy is enacted day by day, while, even as I write, massacre after massacre is reported, our missionaries, true standard-bearers and torch-holders remain at their posts. Christendom forgets right and dignity and squabbles and fights over questions which common sense and reason should settle, and the Armenians are butchered and nobody cares. How long, O Lord, how long!

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD affords you a convenient medium through which to send your much or your little, as God has prospered you, to the relief of these sufferers.

Avail yourselves, dear friends, of the opportunity. Ere the pleasant memory of the holidays fades away, send something to Armenia. In another column of the present issue you will find fuller particulars, and be told how your gifts will be sent.

I am, sincerely yours,
MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

ARMENIAN REFUGEES AT THE DOOR OF OUR RELIEF STATION AT VAN.

(Photographed from Life, and Forwarded by Dr. Grace Kimball.)

B. C. F. M., at Constantinople, and by him forwarded at once to the missionaries in the interior), says:

I can assure you that the need is very great and urgent at every point which you name. The first four places have suffered most severely by massacre, and the number of persons destitute and helpless is quite overwhelming. Our missionaries everywhere are in warmest sympathy with these distressed people, and I am sure they will prove most welcome almoners of the gifts of Christendom.

Erzinjian is not far from Erzeroum, and our missionary force for this district reside at Erzeroum. Rev. W. N. Chambers and Mrs. Chambers are at present the only missionaries at Erzeroum. Mr. Chambers will be delighted to apply the relief which you propose to provide: at both these points. At Harpoot there are three able-bodied men and two who are somewhat infirm through age. The three strong men who can attend to the work of distribution are Rev. H. N. Barnum, D.D., Rev. C. Frank Gates and Rev. Egbert S. Ellis. There are nine missionary women at this station, four of them the wives of missionaries and five single women. These missionaries will distribute the relief for Harpoot and for Diarbekir. Diarbekir is under the care of these missionaries. At Mardin there are but two men on our missionary force, Rev. A. N. Andrus and Rev. W. C. Dewey. There are four women here, the wives of these brethren and two single women. The relief which you sent for Gemarek near Cesarea will be distributed by our missionaries at Cesarea, Rev. James L. Fowle, Rev. W. S. Dodd, M.D., and Rev. Henry K. Wingate.

Private letters received in New York during the week continue to give many details of the sufferings of the Armenians. A letter, sent by a poor mother from Gurun to a relative here, says:

We have only to say that I and my child are living. No male population has been left in our town. They have killed my father. I took the child with me and bread to keep them from dying. But we cannot count the thousands who have perished. Many virgins have been assaulted. Rich and poor alike have suffered; people who had thousands of pounds are to-day begging for bread. Unable to bear the sight of this most wretched condition of the people, and unable to shelter them during the winter, what can be done with such a large multitude, hungered and perishing? . . . Four of the monasteries in our district, sanctuaries that have stood the vicissitudes of centuries, and in which there were treasured thousands of precious relics, vessels and antiques, have been destroyed. The Archimandrite Papazian Johannes, who was here as a guest in the monastery of Tadmam, was subjected to untold tortures, and torn to pieces with his servants and with the guards of the monastery.

It is well known that the Kurds and Hamidieh cavalry, in the recent attack on the Christians of Orfa committed frightful atrocities. Fully two thousand Christians were massacred, but up to the present time no details have been received. At Beridjik near Aintab, over 900 have been massacred. At Kuttarbul, near Diarbekir, on a recent Sabbath, sixty Christian houses were plundered, and in a Sabbath attack on Karobash, seventy villagers were slain by Kurds and the whole place given over to plunder. Similar atrocities are reported from Kaobequai, Bereabeel, Redwan, Till, and other towns and villages. All the letters recently received say that the question of relief is paramount.

All contributions to the Relief Fund will be duly acknowledged in these columns. Contributions during the past week are acknowledged on page 56 of this issue.

THE TRANSVAAL INVASION.

A British Filibustering Expedition Under Col. Jameson Crushing Defeated at Krugersdorp—Magnanimous Victors—All Europe Stirred and England Greatly Agitated.

WHEN Clive, from a comparatively humble governmental post in India, rose up suddenly to the fame and importance of one who, by his brilliant audacity and daring, carved out an empire, he set a bold example which has ever since exercised a powerful fascination upon a certain class of adventurous minds. Our own times furnish not a few remarkable examples of the successful "soldier of fortune," but probably many more of the failure of designs which, boldly conceived and courageously put into execution, yet fell to pieces at the critical moment.

The whole world is now familiar with the story—fully told in the cable dispatches—of the attack and utter defeat of the filibusters who attempted to overthrow the Boer government in the Transvaal, South Africa. Rich in gold mines that needed capital and enterprise to develop them, the Transvaal, ten years ago, was mainly devoted to pastoral and agricultural pursuits. Then, with the advent of the new and foreign element, which poured in, at the first news of the mineral wealth of the country, there came to the whole territory a new life and experience. The Uitlanders—as the Boers called the newcomers—brought with them abundant capital and energy. Johannesburg, till then a mere collection of unpretentious wooden houses such as one sees in new frontier settlements, became the typical mushroom city of Africa, and almost at a bound attained to size and prosperity. To-day it has many substantial, handsome, business blocks, magnificent and costly public buildings, well-laid out streets, a good business quarter, and some 40,000 European population, with as many more Africans, chiefly employed as servants—beside the Boer population. Yet less than twelve years ago, there were on the present site of Johannesburg, only a few huts and probably less than thirty people in all!

Naturally, the sturdy Boers watched the progress of their state, during this foreign influx, with some degree of anxiety. Outnumbered by the Uitlanders five to one, they still preserved in their own keeping the control of public affairs. Political representation was, for the new element, exceedingly difficult of attainment, as according to Boer laws, a stranger, even after his declaration of fealty had to be fourteen years in the territory before he was entitled to citizenship and a voice in the direction of public affairs. As the Uitlanders had already added to the wealth of the colony and besides, were paying, as they claimed, an unduly heavy proportion of the taxes, they demanded representation at Pretoria (the seat of Boer government), and agitation with that object in view was begun at Johannesburg. To all such claims, however, President Paul Kruger and his associates in the administration gave little heed, although they must have seen the storm that was then brewing.

Meanwhile, other eyes were cast longingly toward the Transvaal. Colossal fortunes had been recently made in the African gold and diamond fields and in land speculation, and the Boer territory was known to be rich in minerals. The Dutch agricultural colonists and their descendants had held the Transvaal territory for nearly two hundred years, and had thus far been successful in repelling all invaders. Originally occupying nearly the whole of South Africa, they had receded step by step as the British advanced and had successively surrendered Natal and the Orange State. Their last stand was in the new republic of the Transvaal. By the convention of 1852 with England, the Boers were left in peaceful occupancy of the Transvaal for twenty-five years, but when gold was discovered within the territory, Great Britain promptly annexed it. In Dec. 1880, the Boers rebelled and the South African Republic was organized, subject to British suzerainty. During this rebellion, the Boers showed themselves to be splendid soldiers and true patriots, and their victory at Majuba Hill, when Gen. Colley was killed and an English force totally routed, demonstrated the skill of the Boer generals. Since 1880 there has been peace in the Transvaal until the recent troubles occurred. The complaints of the Uitlanders and the pretense of an ardent desire to redress their grievances, furnished the pretext for the invading expedition which has just come to an inglorious termination. Among the leading spirits of the British South African Company is Dr. Jameson, who as a British Commissioner, not long ago distinguished himself by the prominent part he took in precipitating the war with the Matabeles, which resulted in their subjugation and the annexation by England of their rich territory. This, with other enterprises of a kindred character, made him the idol of a certain adventurous class of foreigners in South Africa. Consequently when Dr. Jameson, with a few associates of his own peculiar sort, proposed to organize a filibustering expedition to go to the relief of the Uitlanders of Johannesburg and overthrow Boer rule in the territory, he soon found himself at the head of a considerable following. It is generally believed, moreover, that his filibustering scheme was actively supported by Cecil Rhodes and the officers of the British South Africa Company, and that certain mining capitalists in Johannesburg were also concerned in the conspiracy. Involved in the plot were the complete overthrow of the Boer republic, the annexation of the territory by England and the securing of large and valuable mining concessions by the chief actors in the military drama.

On the news of Jameson's unsuccessful

even the most casual observer that at such times the so-called "peace of Europe," like the legendary sword of Damocles, hangs suspended by a very thin thread indeed.

PAUL KRUGER, PRESIDENT OF THE TRANSVAAL.

The Transvaal, which is the richest and most important Dutch settlement in South Africa, embraces an area of 125,000 square miles, and is for the most part, high and healthy. Its foreign population is estimated at 60,000, the majority speaking the English language. At least 500,000 natives reside within its borders. Johannesburg, the centre of the gold mining industry, has a steadily growing foreign population. Had the few Boers living there several years ago, been told that by the present time, under their farms, a gold mine would be worked, yielding 136,000 ounces of the precious metal per month couple reaching Europe, the entire Continent became excited. France, Germany, and Russia blamed England for being privy to the freebooting plot to destroy the Boer Republic and that a city would spring up, comparing favorably in architecture with New York or Philadelphia, they would have said "Not unless a miracle is wrought;" but it is even so. During the year 1889, 67 stamps were at work. In 1890, 865. Now there are over two thousand, pounding away at the rich ore. Crushing machinery used is chiefly that of one American firm and it is made in New York City. In 1893, the precious metal produced in the Transvaal, amounted to about $21,000,000 or one fourth of the world's gold, which is estimated at $105,000,000 a year.

Theoretically, the Transvaal is a republic, but practically an oligarchy. The term of presidential service is five years. Burghers qualified to vote choose an executive council, of which the President is chairman. Officers of the Volksraad, or Senate and House of Representatives combined must belong to some Protestant church but any one of sufficient ambition and no religion, can easily adjust that matter.

Paul Kruger, or Oom Paul (Uncle Paul) the President of the Transvaal, is a hale hearty, well-preserved man of sixty-eight years. The older Dutch people are fond of him, and through their influence, he has repeatedly been re-elected. Had English men been allowed to vote, Colonel Joubert a younger and more progressive man would have been chosen to fill the office. Though not quite so old as the President or with his varied experience, he is a power in the land. Kruger's salary amounts to $40,000 with an extra allowance for "coffee." He has, besides, several farms from which he can obtain all the mutton, beef, vegetables and fruit he needs for his table, and can live handsomely without touching his salary. Oranges from his farm he sells to a distiller, who converts the fruit into wine. His simple piety often appears in public utterances, as, for instance, at the "Paaderkraal Festival," a season of as much importance in Boer land, as the "Fourth of July" is to the United States. It commemorates emancipation from British rule.

tain adventurous class of foreigners in South Africa. Consequently when Dr. Jameson, with a few associates of his own peculiar sort, proposed to organize a filibustering expedition to go to the relief of the Uitlanders of Johannesburg and overthrow Boer rule in the territory, he soon found himself at the head of a considerable following. It is generally believed, moreover, that his filibustering scheme was actively supported by Cecil Rhodes and the officers of the British South Africa Company, and that certain mining capitalists in Johannesburg were also concerned in the conspiracy. Involved in the plot were the complete overthrow of the Boer republic, the annexation of the territory by England and the securing of large and valuable mining concessions by the chief actors in the military drama.

Dr. Jameson proceeded with characteristic celerity to execute the plans of the plotters. An armed force, some seven hundred strong, was recruited in Bechuanaland and in the territory of the British South Africa Company and, with Dr. Jameson as leader, marched in the direction of Johannesburg.

and seize the Transvaal. Emperor William sent a telegram of congratulation to President Kruger, which excited England to an unusual degree, and afforded some provocation for warlike bluster on the part of the British journals. Meanwhile the English government officials, as well as those of the English South Africa Company, were prompt to disavow any responsibility for the Jameson expedition.

President Kruger throughout, has acted with dignity and generosity. His prisoners are well cared for, and will be tried in regular form at the proper time. He has requested the British government to exercise its direct authority in preventing further attempts against Transvaal independence, as he believes that others are contemplated.

At no time in recent years have the relations existing between England and the European governments been subjected to as sudden and severe a strain as has resulted from the Transvaal episode. It is not improbable that the Transvaal affair may yet give rise to other complications of even graver moment, for it must strike

PATERSON'S RESCUE MISSION.

How the Christian Workers of Paterson, N. J., are Laboring for the Reclamation of the Degraded and the Relief of the Destitute.

AMONG the institutions established in various parts of the country for the rescue and restoration of the fallen on life's highway, a prominent place must be given to the Rescue Mission of Paterson, N. J. The work was commenced April, 1891, by a band of earnest men, with no means of their own, but with the resolve to do all in their power to help the discouraged men regain their position in society. How much good this line can be done with money one knows better than the men who have attempted this work, but they know, too, that much can be done without money.

The kindly grasp of the hand, the cheering word, the brotherly sympathy the poorest can give, are sometimes more welcome and more inspiring to the poor outcast, accustomed to hard words, than even a gift of money. With consciousness of this fact and with a determination to use every means in their power in the service, the Paterson people began their work. They could do little, but that little should be done.

During the years that have passed since the start, a great deal has been accomplished. Kind friends sympathizing with the effort that was being made, have contributed to its support and have placed funds in the hands of the unselfish men who were engaged in the work, that it might be made more effective. Regular services were held, at which the Gospel was preached and assurance given to the most depraved and vicious that pardon and salvation were freely offered to all and that the power of God was sufficient to deliver from all sin. Wherever that message was proclaimed, fruit comes, and Paterson was no exception to the rule. Drunkards were reclaimed, dissolute men rose from the mire, and the despairing began to hope. Very little could be done in the way of actual relief, but as the beginning of a new life must be in the heart, the workers were sure that they were proceeding in the right road. When a man quits his sins and turns to Christ, the most important step is taken in his rise from destitution. Sin and vice are the cause of the greater part of the misery and poverty of the world and it is by moral reformation alone, that one can be rescued. But as money was supplied, assistance could be given in urgent cases, where the pangs of hunger must be relieved, before the mind could receive the truth. Food and shelter were offered to the homeless and destitute, as far as the funds would go, the mission being the willing almoner of the benevolent people of the city. As the intelligence and discrimination evinced by the managers became more widely recognized, the number of people who thus commissioned the mission to perform the work increased until last year there were 170 contributors whose aggregate gifts amounted to $2,950. Besides these, there were some of the citizens who furnished supplies from their own stores. One sent a basket of meat every week, another sent a package of groceries, a third forty loaves of bread every week, while many sent clothing and other supplies.

The failure of many efforts to help the destitute has arisen from gifts that pauperize, and this failure the mission tried to avoid. While anxious to help all that applied for assistance, the managers did not want on the one hand to encourage idlers, who preferred living on charity to living by honest labor, nor on the other hand to humiliate by gifts men who were ready and willing to work and to earn what they received. After much consideration as to the most suitable field of unskilled labor, it was decided to open a wood-yard in connection with the mission and to make one hour's work with the saw the price of a good meal. This arrangement has proved successful on both sides. The really deserving men who have too much self-respect to enjoy what they have not earned, were glad of the opportunity of doing some work for their food and the idle have stayed away. The mission, too, has benefited by the labor thus applied. Last year its expenses for wood amounted to $1,625 and the proceeds of its sales of the finished article realized $4,690. Probably all the balance does not represent the profit on the work, as the payments for stock may not all have come within the fiscal year and there is no separate record of the meals which formed the payment for labor, but there is no question as to the scheme being productive from a business standpoint in addition to its philanthropic advantages.

In April of last year the good work the Mission had done received substantial recognition from one of the public-spirited citizens of Paterson. Dr. Sherburne R. Merrill, a prominent physician who had abundant opportunity for knowing the need of such work as the Mission was attempting and how successfully it was meeting the need, notified the managers of his intention to increase its facilities. He gave the Mission, as a free gift, a plot of land 135 feet by 100 feet, and promised to erect upon it a brick building of three stories and basement, as a permanent home for the Mission. The gift was most gratefully accepted, and it was decided to perpetuate the memory of the munificent donor by giving the building the name of "The Merrill Home."

The plans adopted in the construction were specially drawn with the view to the object of the Mission's work. The two upper floors were set apart for sleeping accommodation, two rooms on each floor being reserved as temporary infirmaries for any inmates who might be taken sick while in the home, and needing some refuge until they could be received in a hospital. The second floor is occupied by a reading room, a room for meetings and officers' quarters, and, by an ingenious arrangement, the partition separating the reading room from the auditorium can be removed on special occasions, thus giving a room with an area of forty by eighty feet. On the first floor are baths, a fumigator and the large dining room, the whole forming a well-arranged mission building.

An appeal has been made to the citizens of Paterson to furnish the house thus munificently provided. That such a work is a credit to the city is apparent and it deserves hearty support. It is on the lines that Christ adopted when he was here upon earth in caring for the needs of the body as well as of the soul. Christians do not always realize their responsibility in this matter, but the worker knows that it is real.

An Evangelistic meeting is held in the mission every night, the workers being so firmly convinced as ever, that the basis of all permanent reformation of life must be the power of Christ to change the heart. They have had numerous proofs of the fact in their four-and-a-half years' experience. One remarkable instance is well-known in Paterson. It is that of a man who belonged to the class most difficult of all to reclaim—that of periodical drunkards. The man earned good wages and was liked by his employer but was subject to occasional outbreaks of dipsomania. He would suddenly quit work and take to drinking. He would spend all his wages and all the money he could obtain by sell-

IN A CHINESE TEMPLE.

IN a letter to the American Board from Mr. Goddard, who is laboring at Foo-chow, China, is the following description of a temple service of the Taoist order:

"A few days ago I was in a neighboring temple, and, as the present month is the autumn festival, there were many in at their devotions. I wonder if you have as vague ideas of idolatrous worship as I had when I came here? I expected to see elaborate ceremonial and great crowds of people, etc. What I found was very different. This that we enter is a Taoist temple. It is an elaborate collection of buildings with great dark rooms or halls, one side of which will be taken up with the immense images of the particular heroes or demons there worshipped, all very dirty and very much in decay. As we enter we pass a small tea stand kept by a dirty old woman. She lives in a hovel that is attached to the temple. Once inside we wander about from room to room, examining the many idols and watching the few people present—for there are never crowds—as they come and go. This particular temple is dedicated to Uong, Ruler of Heaven. This does not mean God; far from that. It simply means that Mr. Uong, who lived a long time ago, has been deified, and is supposed to have great influence over luck in some calling. It may be over success in business or over safety from fire, or influence with the cholera god. His image represents him as a scowling, angry man in an attitude ready to strike. There are two score other images in this same temple, but Mr. Uong is the principal one, and no trouble arises, because there is no jealousy between gods of wood. The priesthood for this temple descends from father to son, who gets his support from the offerings of the people that come here to worship, from the sale of tea, incense, replies to prayers for particular favors, etc. This priest's income at present is said to be very large.

"Let us watch the devotee and see how he worships idols of wood. First he lights two or three minute sticks of incense, such as are sold in America now for scented rooms, placing them in the urn of ashes before the idol. Then he kneels on the ground before it and, with hands on the ground, bows until his head touches the floor. He knocks his head three times against the floor, and then rises upright on his knees, and then repeats this three times, making nine knockings in all. After this he remains some time on his knees, mumbling a form of words or adoring the idol. When he thinks that he has done this enough to secure the goodwill of the idol he rises, and takes from the altar two pieces of wood that in shape and size are like an ostrich's egg split in two, but really are made of a bamboo sprout that has been sawed in two. These he waves in the smoke of the incense and then returns to his kneeling position before the idol. After holding these pieces of bamboo before him for minute he tosses them into the air. If one falls on the flat side and one on the round, it means that the idol will graciously answer his prayer; if they both fall on the flat side, the result is uncertain and he must resume his devotions; but if they both fall on the round side the idol is said to be laughing at him or refusing to answer. If one falls on the flat side and one on the round, he then goes to the altar and takes a wooden cylinder half filled with flat strips of bamboo on which are written different numbers or characters. Holding this in both hands he slowly moves it up and down. He moves it faster and faster, making the bamboo strips hop up and down, until one hops out upon the floor. This he eagerly scans and then takes to the priest, who for a small sum gives him a sealed paper corresponding to the number on the slip that hopped out, and which contains the answer to his prayer. It professes to tell him the lucky day to plant rice or to begin the repairs on his house."

The Indians.

IN one year the military civil service among our aborigines cost our government $78,000,000. The Oregon war with the Indians cost $10,000,000; the Cheyenne war cost $36,000,000; the Sioux war cost $39,000,000; the Seminole war cost $50,000,000, and over $700,000,000 have been expended in our Indian wars. We have been supporting—I say we, for every man who pays tax has been levied on—we have been supporting in idleness a multitude of Indians. Now, these able-bodied men of the forest, like the able-bodied white men, ought to work if they can find work or take the consequent starvation. There ought to be some way of putting on one roll the aged, the invalid, the imbecile and the crippled of the Indians and having them supported at the expense of the United States Government on good and healthful and sufficient food and under comfortable shelter and reasonably clothed. All the rest of those tribes ought to be put to work. If nothing else can be found for them to do, then put them with a shovel and wheelbarrow to move a mountain from one place to another, and after that move it back again. The great lazy Indian hulks that gather around the railroad stations between Omaha and San Francisco, begging for whiskey and doing nothing for a livelihood, while beneath their feet is land that would yield luxuriant harvests if tilled by the plow and hoe, are nuisances that ought to be abated. Ninety-nine out of a hundred of the Indians have muscle enough and brain enough to earn a living. An idle population is always a besotted population. Any plan that proposes to support an Indian merely because he is an Indian, is doing a wrong to him and an outrage to other races of men. I do not see why the Indians should have a right to occupy land that they will not cultivate, and land that is doing no more now in the way of productivity than it was doing 100 years ago. The trouble is that the United States neither does one thing nor the other. The government professes to support the Indian tribes, while through swindling agencies, its failure to do so is conspicuous. Let the tribes be broken up and sent through all parts of the United States, and then they will learn to pick up a living like the rest of us. As it is, the Indians have been taught to expect the United States government to take care of them, and when the supplies fail to reach them through officials who put into their own pockets that which was supposed to go to the Indians, these barbarians enact a massacre. We have as a nation gone on the wrong principle. We have supposed that this Indian question would settle itself on the theory that these races would die out. This hope, built on the graves of a race of men who have as much right to live as any other race, is a cruel, unreasonable, and unchristian hope. That they may be civilized and Gospelized and saved, both for this world and the next, has been demonstrated in cases innumerable. Bring them out from their seclusion and isolation. Give them the right of suffrage. Make gubernatorial chair and congressional hall and the White House possible. Let the spelling book and the constitution of the United States and the Bible be their rule, and you will have saved a race.

John Wesley's Trials.

JOHN WESLEY, more than any other man that ever lived, crashed into the conventionalities and stamped on formalism and kindled a warmth that melted the pious frigidities. The spirit of great religious awakenings was incarnated in the great apostle born at Epworth, Lincolnshire. There will not be a revival of religion between now and the end of time that will not be obligated to the name and achievements of that man of God who, on March 2nd, 1791, relinquished earth for heaven. I hope that the Lord has allowed him to come out on the celestial battlements so as to hear some of the applaudatory things said of him, for surely he had a hard time when on earth, and heard words of contempt and caricature and execration, and but few words of praise. From the hour when as a boy John Wesley from the parsonage on fire climbed down over a ladder of men formed to allow him to escape from an upper story, until he closed his work, the story of his trials and persecutions was a tragedy. Even Christian men sometimes failed to understand him. So good a man as Mr. Toplady, the author of the "Rock of Ages," said of John Wesley that his forehead was petrified and his cheek impervious to a blush, and that he had been hatching philosophy.

While such uncanny words were said inside the church, the world outside exhausted on Wesley its billingsgate and acrimony. Worst of all was his domestic suffering. As if the outside world could not do enough against him, those nearer home persecuted him. His elder brother, Samuel, wrote to his mother expressing his contempt for him, and protested against her going to hear the younger brother preach, and remonstrated in contemptuous terms at what he called her becoming one of Jack's followers. While in Savannah, Ga., the grand jury indicted Wesley for a long list of offenses. He attended seven sessions of the court ready to prove his innocence on all the charges, but they would not allow him to make answer, so he escaped in the night in a boat, landing twenty miles away, and then trudged the swamps four days and nights in hunger and thirst and fatigue, and took ship at Charleston for England. That is the way America treated John Wesley alive.

Head and Heart.

ALL religion may be divided into two classes, religion of the head and religion of the heart. Some people's religion is all of the head. They give intellectual assent to the teachings of the Bible. They enjoy hearing sermons, provided they are good ones. They relish a theological discussion. But the matter extends no farther. It never reaches the heart. They have as little interest in vital religion, as the Sultan has in the welfare of the Armenians. Others have all their religion in their hearts, and very little in their heads. They are impulsive in action, and are often criticized for their methods. Ideally, let head and heart be combined in this matter. But if we must choose, give us the man who has a heart and no head, rather than the man who has a head and and no heart. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness."

A little religion, like a little learning, is a dangerous thing. Either have a good deal of it, or have nothing to do with it. Some persons have just enough religion in their hearts to make themselves miserable. Have enough to lift you up out of yourselves into the full heights of joy. A little health means illness. A little wealth means poverty. A little wisdom means folly. A little piety means spiritual deadness. If the presence of Christ is worth anything at all, do not peep at him through the keyhole. Open the door wide, and ask him to sit down at your table. If the Bible is worth anything at all, do not hastily stuff down a chapter on retiring, when you are too stupid to enjoy it. Make it your daily food. Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly. "Either Christ is all in all, or he is nothing at all."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

The words of the hymn: "My Song shall be of Jesus," published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 25th, last, were composed by Fanny J. Crosby in 1875, and the music appeared in "Brightest and Best," a Sunday School Collection, by Lowry & Doane. Words and music are copyrighted by Biglow & Main.

Rev. Luther P. Ludden (who was General Manager of the Nebraska State Relief Commission last year), writes as follows regarding the Armenian distress:

My Young People's Society were greatly interested in the Armenian relief work, and while we are only a mission church, one evening without any previous announcement we took a collection and sent it forward to aid to your fund.

G. W. L., Davenport, Ia. Is pew-renting right?

The church must decide whether that is the best way of raising the funds necessary for public service. Contributions have to be made in some form and it has generally been found most convenient to regulate them by the right to occupy a seat in a church. There is neither right nor wrong in the matter, so long as the pews are not rented in such a way as to exclude from service persons too poor to pay rent.

Subscriber, E. Gloucester, Mass., writes:

It seems to me that if all ministers and church members and peace-loving people took this matter of the Venezuelan boundary in prayer, and work as well in the interest of peace they could accomplish the desired result—that of arbitration. J. W. G., Chatham, Ont. As I have gone into the lively business and it is the custom, and it is allowed by law, to keep open on Sunday, I would be very thankful if you would answer through THE MAIL-BAG if I could hire out rigs and take pay for them on Sundays and still be a consistent Christian? How much could I do as work of necessity?

The commandment is plain and unmistakable: "Thou shalt not do any work." Christian interpretation, and Christ's own example, have led us to except works of necessity and mercy. Your own conscience will unerringly distinguish these from those that are needless and merely undertaken for love of gain.

Bessie F., Danbury, Conn. What is the "Island of Fire" in Java? Is it a volcano?

The Gheko Kandka Gumko, "Home of the Hot Devils" (known to the world as "The Island of Fire"), is a lake of boiling mud, situated at about the centre of the plains of Grobogan, and is called an island because the great emerald sea of vegetation which surrounds it gives it that appearance. It is about two miles in circumference. Near the centre columns of soft, hot mud are seen continually rising and falling.

"Friend," Caledonia, Mich. Are not the many lodges now organized injurious by diverting interest from the Church and giving the impression that membership in the lodge is sufficient for salvation?

If by "Lodges," you mean such as the Freemasons, Odd-fellows, etc., we think no one associates them with salvation, but understands their purely secular character. But if you refer to the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League, etc., we have no hesitation in saying that they are helpful not injurious and they tend to strengthen the Church not to divert interest from it.

Subscriber, Carthage, O. What is the Mohammedan religion? Do they believe in immortality, heaven and punishment?

They believe in Allah (God or Father-of-all), and in Mohammed as his prophet. They believe that the "faithful" will enter Paradise, which they hold to be a region of sensuous enjoyments. Their Koran or sacred book is an elaborate collection of hymns, prayers, dogmas, speeches, narratives, legends, laws and morals, in almost all points the reverse of our Bible, inciting to savagism and ferocity, which the present Armenian persecution is an example. They believe in punishments and rewards.

Reader, Paterson, N. J. What city has the dense population—the largest number of people to the square mile?

London, doubtless, among the great cities, although New York, Paris, Liverpool and Yeddo are probably almost as densely peopled, in certain localities. According to a French authority, the most thickly peopled spot on earth is a portion of the Maltese city of Valetta known as the Moneraggio. This quarter has a population of 2574 souls on a plot of buildings covering less than two and a-half acres—equal to 636,000 inhabitants to the square mile.

Wm. J. Tucker, Birmingham, Ala. 1. What does Christ mean John 3:5, by being born of water and of the Spirit? 2. Is it right to use the title "Reverend in the face of Christ's prohibition" (Matt. 23:8)?

1. Theologians have disputed on the subject for centuries, and there is no probability of their agreeing. We suggest with all due respect to the differing schools, that Christ referred to the two-fold operation of the Spirit that it would operate to cleanse as water and to quicken as by fire. Both influences were needed to fit a man for the kingdom. 2. The title is merely one of courtesy and respect. It does not imply authority as the title, Rabbi, did. Still, several eminent preachers such as Moody, Gordon, Spurgeon and Dale have objected to its being applied to them.

Mrs. Elizabeth Waugh. What is required of patrons of the Bowery Mission? Are we to see a certain amount, or to let our conscience decide what we shall give?

Each patron is expected to accord to the Mission his or her full moral and sympathetic support and also to contribute once a year (the beginning of a new year, if practicable) such an amount as conscience may suggest and the circumstances warrant. It is the work of all the patrons equally and each of all should give it the heartiest support voluntarily. All funds are sent to the Treasurer of the Bowery Mission, Bible House, New York, each contribution will be duly acknowledged by mail.

Madagascar Missions Destroyed.

Soon after the murder of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson at Arivonimamo, reported in this journal two weeks ago, the rumor spread throughout Madagascar that all the missionaries were to be killed, the missionaries' property stolen, and the mission houses destroyed. The report caused great alarm, as the missionaries were denials, and as the Queen's troops, who had protected them and preserved them, were powerless, having been disarmed by the cowardly French invaders. Native marauding bands, which had lived in the wake of the French advance, had consequently full confidence and punishment would follow attacks on the missionaries, and that little or no chance was to be apprehended. The result has been the destruction of another mission. In a beautiful valley about twenty-five miles from Antananarivo, the capital, was the mission station of Raminandro, under the charge of the Rev. D. M. Mahon. It was established thirty years ago by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and Mr. Mahon, with his wife and a native teacher have labored on the work successfully. A substantial mission house was built, and converts were gathered, a church and schools were erected. This station was the next one looked out for destruction after the murder of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson. The villagers heard of the plot, and being warmly attached to the missionaries, were concerned for their safety. They posted scouts in the mountains to give warning of the approach of the lawless mob. Day and night they watched, and at last they saw them come, a great mob armed with clubs and spears. The mission was carried with all speed to the mission, and no time was lost in securing the safety of the missionaries. Mr. and Mrs. Mahon were hurried away out of the reach of the assailants. Balked of their prey, the savage men vented their fury on the mission buildings, completely destroying them. Suspecting that the villagers had assisted in the escape of the missionaries, they also destroyed their houses, leaving the whole village in ruins. It is evident from the dispatches that the animosity to the missionaries does not proceed from the people as a whole, but from a lawless element, which is taking advantage of the overthrow of the government. It is now as it was in the days of the Psalmist.

He walked on every side when the vilest men are exalted. (Ps. 12: 8.)

Free Man at Last.

A pardon was issued a few days ago by Gov. Atkins of Georgia to a man who has apparently a unique claim to a distinction of a peculiar kind. His name is Trone Wilson and he is, if the reports of the local journals are correct, probably the last man in the country to come into enjoyment of the benefits of the emancipation proclamation of President Lincoln. When that document was signed, Wilson, then a slave, was in jail awaiting his trial for a serious crime. He was convicted and sent to the penitentiary with a life-sentence. He has been there ever since, until the other day, the Governor's pardon arrived. Then he was set at liberty and walking out of the penitentiary, he drew the first breath of freedom he had ever drawn in his life. Doubtless he heard thirty years ago, that the President had proclaimed liberty to his race, but being a criminal as well as a slave, he needed pardon as well as emancipation. Many a sinner standing self-convicted before God has felt himself to be in a similar situation. He is barred from God not only by being of a fallen race but as a sinner. The redemption of the race from the curse on the children of Adam, would not have availed them, if Christ had not also made atonement for their actual sins.

While we were yet sinners Christ died for us. Rom. 5: 8.)

Quarantine Against Insects.

An agricultural journal advocates the enactment of a national quarantine bill against destructive insects. It states that every year the crops of the country suffer to the extent of millions of dollars from the ravages of insects brought from foreign lands. California has already set the example by appointing a qualified entomologist as inspector of the cargoes of fruit brought to San Francisco from the tropics. In the East there is no provision of this kind, and the journal avers that on the fruit stands in every city on the Atlantic seaboard scale insects may be seen on the fruit, or the decorative plants from the West Indies and South America, which, if they once obtain a foothold, will do more injury than the gypsy moth has done in Massachusetts. It is suggested that Congress provide for the appointment of a Board made up of officers from the Experiment Stations, with power to seize and destroy fruits or plants that show traces of the presence of these rapacious creatures. It is contended that the country would save every year a hundred times the cost of such a board in crops, which without some provision of this kind will be destroyed. This is not the only kind of mischief coming from foreign lands, against which we ought to be on our guard. In books and periodicals and in the emissaries of evil in human shape we are receiving influences which threaten to rob us of Lord's Day observance and some of our most precious institutions.

One sinner destroyeth much good. Eccles. 5: 13.

A Unique Tombstone.

In the cemetery at Kittanning, Pa., a tombstone has been placed that is believed to be the only one of its kind in the world. It is of polished glass, with a clear inscription, and was recently placed there by a citizen of Kittanning in memory of his mother. It stands on the slope of a gentle declivity, and attracts more notice than the more expensive and elaborate marble and granite monuments around it. It is about a foot and a half wide and four feet high, arched at the top. The glass is of unusual thickness, of the kind made for the circular panes that cover the port-holes of steamers. It is fixed in a mortise of sandstone, which forms an effective background to it. The practical indestructibility of glass was the quality that recommended it to the citizen who had it set up. Granite and marble seem to be hard enough to last for all time, but in any old cemetery it can be seen what havoc wind and rain, heat and cold make of them, but weather will have no effect on the glass, which will never decay. This, however, may be broken, so that even this ingenious device does not guarantee an imperishable memorial. The day is coming when every material memorial must perish, and then it will be found that the enduring record is that which God promises to his people:

The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance. (Ps. 112: 6.)

The Cost of Silence.

A prisoner in the penitentiary at Raleigh, N. C., has resolved to remain there the remaining two years of his sentence rather than answer the questions of the Governor of the State. Two years ago he was sentenced to four years imprisonment, but recently some facts have come to light about his trial which have excited public sympathy for him. A petition signed by influential persons shall give up their sins, and this often proves an insuperable obstacle.

If the wicked will turn from all his iniquities, he shall not die. Ezek. 18: 21.

BRIEF NOTES.

Many Inquiries Have Been Received from persons desiring to know the contents of the United States Bible Society's report for the year 1895. The report is a most interesting and valuable presentation of the subject published in recent years. The Commission has arranged to supply single copies of the pamphlet at five cents. Temperance clubs, churches and other organizations can be supplied at $3.00 per 100 copies.

The Book Mentioned in These Columns Recently as having been written by the present Pope and since condemned as heretical, proves to have been written by a man of great ability. A positive denial of the Pope's authorship is made in "The Independent" by Mgr. del Val, the Pope's chamberlain. It is stated that the author was the archbishop of the cathedral of which the present Pope was archbishop.

A Revised New Testament has Just Been Issued in France. It is the work of a Commission appointed at the suggestion of the Synod of the Reformed Church. Several years have been spent in the revision, and the utmost care has been taken to have the book absolutely accurate in its rendering of the original. Professor Matter has been President of the Commission since the death of Pastor Bersier, the original President.

Professor Thomaian, the Marsovan Teacher whose portrait was published in this journal at the time of the first outbreak of persecution in Armenia, has received news that his sister and her sons are among the victims of the massacre at Harpoot. The sudden interruption of the letters from his brothers leads him to believe that they, too, have been slain. Professor Thomaian has been in England since his release from the Turkish prison.

The Meetings held by Rev. B. Fay Mills in Columbus, O. have been, a correspondent writes, a source of untold blessing. For nearly a month Mr. Mills preached three times every day except Saturdays. The noon meetings were held at first in the First Church but had to be removed after the first week to the Board of Trade Building owing to lack of space. The meetings were held in the Rink which has a seating capacity of five thousand and it was filled to overflowing. Thirty churches united in the work.

The Official Year Book of the Protestant Church in France gives the total number of Protestants in the country as 38,218,000. Of the Protestants at the recent census was 38,218,000. Of the Protestants 340,483 belong to the Reformed Church and 37,877,517 to the Lutheran.

Mr. D. L. Moody Delivered a lecture to the Students of the Evangelical Seminary on January 6, on "How to Reach Non-churchgoers." The lecture was the first of a series of lectures on Practical Christianity which are to be delivered by various eminent men.

An Interesting Convert from Roman Catholicism is Rev. Paul Pollock, who preached at Mr. O'Connor's Mission in New York on January 20. He was sent by the Roman Catholic Church to China as a Missionary, but while there he became acquainted with a Methodist Missionary by whom he was led to renounce Romanism.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman has been requested to return to his former church in Philadelphia. Arrangements are said to have been made by which the associate pastors at Bethany will relieve Dr. Chapman of his duties at certain periods so as to enable him to devote his labors as an Evangelist for a part of the year.

A Recent Traveler in Asia Reports that the whole of the ruins believed to be those of ancient Babylon, are now owned by wealthy Jews in Baghdad. It is 2400 years since the Jews were carried captive to Babylon.

Evangelist H. E. Wycoff has been Conducting Revival Services at Memphis, Mo. The Methodist Church in which they have been held was filled with people, and many persons have been received into membership.

A Cablegram from The British Section of The Evangelical Alliance to Dr. Josiah Strong, Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance of the United States, was received on January 3, asking Christians here to unite with British Christians on January 8 in special prayer "that Christlike counsels may prevail in the present crisis."

The Managers of the American Bible Society received communications from many of their agents in foreign lands at their recent meeting. Among others Rev. H. Loomis, of Japan, reported his visit to Korea; Rev. H. P. Hamilton described the difficulties the Society's colporteurs encountered in Mexico; Rev. F. Penzotti sent a report from Callao, and Rev. C. W. Kilbon, of Natal, supplied information as to the revision of the Zulu Bible. The issues from the Bible Society's presses during December were 12,000 copies.

The Wesley Evangelists Held Services Last week in the Bedford St. M. E. Church, New York. They began with the Watch-night service and continued until January 10. Last Sunday they were at St. Paul's M. E. Church, New York. On January 26 they held meetings in Grace M. E. Church, Trenton, N. J., for a series of meetings. From a report prepared by the leader, Mr. J. H. Cannon, it appears that during last year they assisted twenty-five churches and conducted two hundred revival services at which 350 made professions of faith.

MISSION HOUSE AT RAMAINANDRO.

CHURCH AND SCHOOLS IN MADAGASCAR RECENTLY DESTROYED

Rescued by Love.

THE morning was one of those desperately cold ones, which mean nothing to happy people sitting by their firesides, but which appal shivering women and children, and drive to the verge of suicide hapless men out of work, with no prospects and families dependent on them. Did you ever think what it would be to buy your coal by the pailful from the corner grocery, and hesitate between a yesterday's stale loaf and a bunch of soup vegetables, not knowing which to buy?

It is bad enough to be cold and poor and hungry. But it is far worse to have crime and sin upon your conscience and to feel that burden added to your other misery.

Mabel Loomis drew on her thin cotton gloves and buttoned her sleazy sacque over her chest, as she left her lodging-house and sought the milliner's where she hoped to find work. She did what many poor women do, paid room-rent for a bare hall chamber in a dingy street, and bought her food as she could, or went without it. Whether or not Mabel and those in similar circumstances eat, they must have shelter, and the room-rent at all hazards must be saved, often cent by cent.

Mabel had not always been in her present case. Back in her memory was a little home in the country, where there was always plenty and something to spare. She had quarrelled with her father, and left that roof of his in a fit of anger, and pique like an armed man stood in the way of her going back. Sometimes at night, when too hungry to sleep, there came to her a vision of her mother, stirring porridge over the great roaring stove, for wood was plentiful in the upland region, and they did not stint it; of her sister, the district school teacher, pretty Phebe, so happy and round-cheeked; of her brother and her young friends. Then, too, she would see her father, stern, rigid, unbending, his brow deeply furrowed, his hair white, and she, who had inherited his own stubbornness, did not relent then, nor think of the tender heart under the granite exterior. The sin of hate still lay heavy on her soul.

There had come to her lately another temptation, vile and low, and once she would have spurned it. But, alas! in her great need and suffering, she had allowed this fearful thing to whisper in her ear of a means to procure food and warmth. Poor Mabel.

She was indeed at the turning of the ways this morning, when she left the milliner's with the suave denial ringing in her ears. No work. That meant that she might not raise enough for her room-rent this month.

Walking waveringly on, she had not broken her fast this morning, she met a girl known to her, who belonged to the class whom good women shun. The girl stopped and thrust into Mabel's hand a bit of money.

"You look dead beat out. Take this," she cried.

"No," said Mabel. "No, Blanche; you are kind, but I am not begging yet!"

She walked tremblingly on. At a street corner a door opened and two beautiful young women, laughing and chatting, tripped down the steps. An elderly lady with a very sweet voice and a gentle, benignant countenance followed them and stood saying good-bye.

"Go in, Mamma! You'll get pneumonia," called one of the girls. "Don't stand there, dear!"

"Come home soon, my children," called the mother, closing the door.

The little happy scene was over in an instant, but it had impressed itself on Mabel's consciousness. She walked on blindly, a great billow of home-sickness sweeping over her. She had a dear mother, too; a mother who would stand at the door, with her little gray shawl around her shoulders, and her spectacles on her worn, old eyes, and call in that same crooning mother-voice, "Come home soon, children! Don't be late, darlings!"

"Where are you going, my pretty maid?" The street was lonely now. Though it was near mid-day, few passers-by were on it. In the distance it widened out to old wharves, and a green, cold, tumbling, tossing river!

The familiar words were insolently spoken, and there was a coarse clutch upon her arm. A red, brutal face, breathing fumes of liquor, thrust itself close to hers.

With sudden strength she shook off the grasp, and gave a burning, defiant look at the insulting speaker. The look of a pure heart, triumphant over temptation forever, in that moment was in her eyes. It cleaved like a sword, even the thickened sensibilities of the ruffian and sot, and murmuring, "I beg your pardon, Miss," he slunk away.

Mabel kept straight on. Was that the river she heard, wooing her with its lulling sound? Was it death that invited her to seek an escape from sorrow and wretchedness?

I do not know. She was arrested, suddenly, by a sweet clear voice, and looking down, she saw a boy, in velvet suit, knickerbockers, and fur cap. He had pulled off the last and held it in his hand.

"Lady," he said, "you are to come with me. Mamma saw you from our window, and sent me after you. Everybody minds my mother."

There was sweet compulsion in the childish manner. Mabel turned, unsteadily.

"Here, let me lead you!" he said, and took her cold unresisting hand in his small warm clasp.

The boy led her to the "house with the mother." Thus she always afterward thought and spoke of it.

"I know you are hungry, dear," said the woman who greeted her, the same who had just speeded off her own girls, "and I see you are cold. Before we talk, I must make you comfortable. Rupert, dear, ring for luncheon to be served in my room. You have had yours, go run off to your skating, if you like, and a pleasant time to you, my boy!"

The hour which followed was an era in Mabel's history. She told Mrs. Van Switzer everything, from first to last. This lady was one of God's human angels who live to do his errands and speak his messages. There are such, God be thanked, everywhere on His footstool.

When the talk ended, the dear lady said solemnly, "Child, in this earth of ours, there is only one sin which cannot be forgiven. It is the sin of hate and vindictiveness. God himself can pardon it only in one way, by taking away the stony heart, and giving instead a heart of flesh. Let us pray!"

The two women knelt, the older and the younger. When they arose, Mabel's eyes were wet, but there was a smile on her face.

"I will arise," she said, "and go unto my Father."

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Notable Centenary.

The Celebration of the Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of the Great German Historian, Leopold Von Ranke.

SO recently has the world been bereft of its great scholar, thinker and writer, Leopold Von Ranke, that the celebration of his centenary comes upon us almost as a surprise. Yet it is really a hundred years since he was born in the quiet little Saxon town of Wiehe, though it is less than ten years since he laid down his pen forever. One cannot but wonder whether the bright eager spirit has found that the almost whimsical hope he uttered years ago is gratified. Laboring one day at his interminable task of sifting the materials for his great historical volumes, he said that there must surely be archives in Heaven with which if it were only possible to get at them, the only true world-history could be written. With Von Ranke truth was a passion. No consideration would ever induce him to veer from rigid impartiality. He would tell the fact as he honestly believed it to have been; and he spared neither time nor pains in his effort to discover the real truth as to the most trivial event, before he incorporated it in his history. The decision to follow this honest course was made early in life, when in one of his brief vacations he read the historical novels of Sir Walter Scott. Von Ranke was horrified by the levity with which the novelist manipulated history to produce his stories. To Von Ranke it seemed a sin of the deepest dye to distort the truth for the sake of adding color to an historical picture. He resolved that first and foremost of all aims, his should be to write what was true.

He was at Leipzig when this resolution was formed and he had already perceived that his sphere of literary labor would be the historical field. His first school was at Donndorf after which he studied at Pforta, a school famous for the number of literary men of eminence who received their early training there. He was thoroughly grounded in the classics before he left it for Leipzig and had read the Iliad and the Odyssey through three times. At Leipzig Plato and the poets were laid aside for the historians, and on leaving the University to become a teacher at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, it was to history he turned as his future life work. He was the pioneer of that painstaking school which made this latter half of the century table in literature—the writers who care not so much for artistic effects as for facts. He set the example of dealing only with original documents when they were accessible, wading through reams of false letters and dispatches and deciphering most illegible caligraphy, rather than accept statements at second hand. The system was new then, but its value is understood. Patiently toiling to verify every fact and date he collected his material and then with masterly skill wove them into life-like pictures. His first important work was a History of the Princes and Peoples of South Europe in the thirteenth and seventeenth centuries. It was published in 1827 and at once established its author's claim to a place in the rank in the field of living historians. He was called to a Professorship in Berlin from that time to the close of his life studies and his labors were incessant.

Volume followed volume with such rapidity that the world wondered at the industry as much as it admired his genius. He went to Rome, to Venice, to Paris to London to examine the archives. He spent month after month poring over manuscripts yellow with age. His sympathies were boundless and to every character appeared in his works he strove to do handed justice. His famous "History of the Popes" like his later work on "History of the Reformation" proved a trait in his character. While his pen thus busy he was performing the duties of his professorship and his lectures were attracting students from every land. They were astonished when they saw prodigy of learning, but they all loved and honored him. Gissebrecht, his long friend, gives a life-like picture of him in his prime. Very small in stature, a head somewhat disproportionate in size, great masses of dark hair, strongly marked features and large blue eyes glistening with penetrating light. Rapid in speech and hurried in movement, his whole personality gave the impression of keenness, eagerness and delight in his work. His motto he chose for his coat-of-arms was in 1864 he was raised to the ranks of nobility was, "Labor itself is pleasure" and his life was an example of his axiom. In his eightieth year he was working ten hours a day and was then commencing his gigantic task of linking together historical works to form one continuous history of the world. He was still toiling at his task on that May day of 1886, in ninety-first year, when the messenger of death came and called him away.

A Natural Baptist.

Nestled among the Berkshire Hills in Massachusetts is the town of Cheshire, known by many New Yorkers as a summer retreat. The chief attraction is the exhilarating air and clear mountain water. A case of typhoid fever has not been known in this village for over twenty years. A few minutes' walk from the village proper, toward the west, one finds a beautiful sequestered nook! Only a few rods from the main road in a field runs the rippling singing kitchen brook, forming a pool under the overhanging branches of a majestic oak tree; here is found a most charming natural baptistry. The afternoon of the last Lord's Day of 1895, the Rev. E. J. Harding, Pastor of the Baptist Church of this town, led down into this running stream, under the spreading branches of this national canopy, a man and wife, nearly seventy years of age, and also a middle-aged man, and baptized them, while throng upon the shores sang, "We will gather at the river." Pastor Harding is baptized forty-three, mostly adults, during the year just closed.

Sang A Hymn While Dying.

One of the most faithful young workers of the American Missionary Association was Mrs. N. D. Merriman who died recently at Selma, Ala. Mrs. Merriman took the full college course at Fisk University, graduating in 1891. Professor Spencer was for four years her instructor in Greek. He writes: "Let us thank God that was true with her at the evening of life." This was indeed true. A few hours before the end, when seemingly at the very brink, strength was given to sing in her remarkably clear, flute-like tones the verse, "And moves in a mysterious way." Her friends sang that hymn at her funeral; also, at request, "O mother, dear Jerusalem."

Kansas "Dug-Out" Homes.

Overlooking Underground Structures, yet they may be Made Comfortable Enough—Two Typical Homes Photographed.

FEW people who live in the East have any idea what a Western "dug-out" is like. The photographs on this page will enlighten them. These pictures were made by Mr. Frank Kizer, a missionary of the American Sunday School Union in Kansas, and are fair types of hundreds of similar dwellings in that State. Mr. Kizer lately wrote from Downs, Kan., "the long pleasant Fall days that marked the past few dry years in Kansas, have about come to a close, and the blizzards will soon be upon us. The farmers will have about one-third of a crop in the State. Corn is so cheap that they are burning it for fuel, as it takes loads of corn to buy one-half a ton of coal. As the crops have failed for the past two or three years, it seems hard now that they cannot turn what they have into money.

I have spent the Fall visiting and holding meetings with the new schools formed the past summer. A large number of them will close on account of the children not having the proper clothing and the people not being able to furnish the fuel to heat the house for service. I have found a deeper interest than usual in the schools formed. Many prayer meetings and Christian Endeavors have been formed; thus giving the people a plan of worship even if they do not have the ministers with them.

"Here are the photographs of two dug-out homes. In one the people are sitting on the roof and to the right you can see the doorway that leads to the interior. To the left you can see their new sod-house with a board roof, but it is not finished and will not be this season, as the man is unable. The family are very poor, and do not have the clothing to attend Sunday School. But they love to read the papers that are sent home to them. The other dug-out is built of stone and is far more comfortable. When the storm-doors are closed it is very warm. These people live about seven miles from Sunday School and church. Their fuel is mostly cowchips and the few sunflowers and cobs that they pick up.

"It is a blessed privilege to carry the gospel to these dug-out homes, and as the papers and Bibles are distributed to see their faces light up with gladness. One lady has one hundred and forty-five of these people enrolled in the Home Department of the Sunday School. I have been helping her with donations of books and papers the past year. They pledge themselves to study the Sunday School lesson in their homes each Sunday morning during the year. She visits them and questions them on the lesson from time to time. Among her pupils are many Catholics and Methodists. I will reach most of the new schools by visitation this Fall. Everyone is very kind and seems so glad to see me. I often draw pictures for them for two hours of an evening, but they do not seem to tire, and are always ready for more. Pray for and help these children that are so far from any place that they may receive God's Word."

Children, the Hope of the Nation.

The children of the middle class are the embryos of our future literary, artistic and scientific lights. These, from the knowledge of economy and thrift with the simple pleasures and affections acquired and practiced among the home folks, form the life from which spring the hopes of the nation. At the other extreme are the waifs of the street, whose homes are either unhappy from vice, or lonely because of the third time, "Mamma, tell me now, is it light in heaven?" But the mother had no reply to give. The little boy's life was spared. Soon after his recovery, his parents with him visited a friend's home where grace was said at the table. He at once asked his father, "Papa, why don't we pray at the table?" He was told to be quiet. But the next time in their own home he demanded, "Papa, I want to pray, teach me a prayer." His father said, "Wait till the next time." The little boy was still and waited until the next meal, when, to his father's great annoyance, he repeated his request. Again he was told to wait until the next time. When he asked for the third time to be taught a prayer, his father yielded. The child has at last led both parents into the light.

Japanese Wedding Preparations.

In Japan an engagement is announced by giving a feast to the relatives, when the presents are displayed, and the whole affair is talked over. A bride makes four changes in her personal appearance. She always changes her dress for a more modest style, and she must now dress her hair like a married woman. She shaves her eyebrows, and sometimes blackens her teeth—an emblem of constancy. The wedding dress for a girl is generally white, such as the dead wear, as it means that she will not leave her husband's home until death. On her head she wears a covering of white silk wadding which covers her forehead. As the bride leaves the

A Song of Hope.

CHILDREN of yesterday,
Heirs of to-morrow,
What are you weaving—
Labor or sorrow?
Look to your looms again—
Faster and faster
Fly the great shuttles
Prepared by the Master.
Life's in the loom,
Room for it—room!

Children of yesterday,
Heirs of to-morrow,
Lighten the labor
And sweeten the sorrow,
Now—while the shuttles fly
Faster and faster.
Up and be at it—
At work with the Master,
He stands at your loom,
Room for him—room!

Children of yesterday,
Heirs of to-morrow,
Look at your fabric
Of labor and sorrow.
Seamy and dark
With despair and disaster,
Turn it—and lo,
The design of the Master!
The Lord's at the loom,
Room for him—room!

The Boys and the Lion.

M R. JAMES D. CARLISLE, of Pittsburg, Pa., has received a letter from Rev. Edwin H. Richards, missionary at Inhambane, South Africa, in which the writer gives a most interesting account of an adventure he, with several of his native boys, had while traveling in the desert lately. They had camped, tired and hungry, for the night, when "at nine o'clock a majestic roar at most uncomfortably short range, shook me right out of my umbrella, and shook the boys out of their mosquito blankets, and our poor dog scrambled between my legs so quickly that I hardly knew whether it were not the beast in question. The rifle was hunted up and a ball was projected in the near vicinity of the spot where the thunder came from. We would not have wounded his majesty's feelings, no, not for the lives of half of us, but if we had been able to have planted an explosive shell right in the centre of his intellectual works, or blown his teeth out and his claws off, we would have performed the feat. His lionship replied by gently lashing his sides with his tail, and soon made about half a circle around us, and got off another monologue on the subject of diet. My first thought on the matter, as soon as I could think at all, was that the Lord had answered our prayers wrong side round and bottom side up, and that the 'meat' was about to go the wrong way altogether.

"But the Lord is mindful of his own," He remembers his children. We did everything we could to entertain that wily beast. We kindled a fire, we sang hymns to him, we prayed for him to keep out of our nest, we shot guns over him, we waved torches at him, we shook the washdish at him, we danced for him, and left no means at our disposal untried in the way of pastime for him. He was apparently delighted with our 'show,' and did what he could toward reviving our depressed spirits. He walked round about us all night long, replying to our every effort with blood-curdling encores. But at the very first blush of day he apparently be-thought himself of his wife and children, and hastily betook himself away, no doubt conjuring up some lame excuse for being out so late. I sincerely hope Mrs. Lady Lion was on the sharp lookout for him, and gave him a talking to at home."

the family being away at work. Vices learned at home, vices inherent, vices learned in the street, make the influence of such children poisonous. Fathers, mothers, whatever your state in life, give your children the benefit of your company, whenever possible. Make home a pleasant place and, by studying their tastes, and influence them in choosing their playfellows.

A Child Leading Them.

A six-year-old boy, the child of wealthy parents and a pet of their lovely home, (writes a Christian worker) was very sick,—so sick that they feared he would die. The parents professed not to believe in the Bible, and the name of God was never mentioned, consequently, the child received no religious instruction, but when he lay very sick one day he called to his mother, and when she hurried to his bedside, he asked her, "Mamma, is it light in heaven?" His mother was startled, but did not answer. After a little while, he called her again, sat up in bed and repeated his question. Again the mother did not answer him, but gently laid him back on his pillow. He called her again, and pleaded for house, her attendants scatter salt in the streets, and build a fire at the gate, just as they do at a funeral. Great preparations are made by the groom for the coming of the bride, and the house is beautifully decorated. The chief decorations are placed in a small recess in the parlor, with the floor raised a few inches above the rest of the room. Here is placed the horai—shimadai. Horai is a fabulous mountain, rising from the sea, where men reside in immortal youth and happiness; shimadai is a stand, on which are arranged branches of bamboo, emblematic of endurance; of pine, which means fidelity; of the plum, signifying patience. As the bride arrives at the door, a woman acts as a guide through the intricate ceremonies.

Rest.

Rest is not quitting this busy career,
Rest is the fitting of self to one's sphere.
'Tis the brook's motion, clear without strife,
Fleeing to the ocean after it's life.
'Tis living and serving the highest and best,
'Tis onward, unswerving. And this is true rest.

CHAPTER I.

The Day of the Funeral.

Oh, everything was in a whirl! And was this so strange? What is Death but the maelstrom that is going round and round and round continually, dragging down into its vortex the things strongest, fairest, best? It upsets and inverts all things. It was now in the house where Janet Morton lived, and especially in the parlor, where the curtains were all dropped though there was no intrusive sun to be shut out, for the day was one of wrathful storm all along the coast. In the parlor where, in long, stiff rows, people took their places as fast as they arrived. In the parlor where the centre of all thought and the centre of all vision—far as people could see at all—was that black-draped coffin bearing on its lid a prim wreath of dark-green ivy leaves and a bunch of wheat stalks dyed a vivid yellow for this special occasion.

"Waitin' for the minister," was the information volunteered by a stout, young woman in black. Paulina Davis, domestic and housekeeper of another branch of the Morton family, made the remark to Mrs. Blakey Chase, another friend of the Morton's and admitted to a place in the circle of real mourners.

"He'll have a hard time a-comin' all the way over the mash-road, and his old chaise will hold water but 'taint warranted to keep it out," whispered back Mrs. Blakey Chase.

"She looks real peaceful in the coffin," again observed Paulina, using as small a quantity of voice as possible. As she had much to spare, she succeeded in talking so that everyone could hear her.

"Poor thing! She had a stormy enough time when alive. And to think she's got all through, buried her husband and four children, and left only Janet behind to mourn her."

"Yes, indeed, poor thing, I say! Janet come down?"

No, Janet was upstairs as Paulina very well knew, but she wanted to break up the awful setness and stiffness of the hour—wanted to say something, and she asked a question about a fact very well known to her. But it was a relief to Mrs. Chase also to say something and not hear just the occasional rustling of those stiff forms in black, the occasional hemming of a throat in discomfort, and besides all this, the moaning or the storm around the house, and under it and through it and over it all, the steady roar of the sea in anger, only a short distance from the house.

"I wonder—" said Mrs. Chase, who very well knew Janet's whereabouts, but was grappling busily for a subject of suppressed conversation like a diver feeling with his hands for treasures in a dark nook under the water.

"Dear me, it's a fearful day," remarked Paulina.

As if to emphasize and prove this fact, the outer door of a room in the rear of the house was now thrown open violently, and a rough voice exclaimed, "There's a wreck come ashore!"

All doors between the parlor and the entrance, were wide open. In none of the rear rooms was there any noise save that of the tea-kettle humming away as it sat perched on the kitchen stove and saying, "I am ready to cheer up any disconsolate mourner with a cup of tea after the funeral." Any big sound like this voice at the door, and especially the startling intimation of a wreck ashore, went straight to the parlor.

"It isn't there," "It isn't there," "It isn't there," exclaimed Paulina. "He's got no sense of things, a-barkin' out that way."

Paulina went from the parlor, inwardly glad to escape from the gloomy restrictions of the place, but prepared outwardly to manifest her grim displeasure to Jed the moment she reached him.

"Why, Jed, where's your manners?" addressing the gun-barrel that had shot out that wreck-news.

Jed was a big, moose-kind of a young man. Strong! Ask the fishermen if any one could lift as many pounds of fish as Jed Davis. His face was rough and red. His eyes were a deep brown and looked more like the eyes of an animal than a man. "Something is wanting," you said when you saw and heard Jed. He was fat from idiocy. Nobody called him fool and still you felt that when the machinery of the brain was put together, a wheel was left out somewhere. He abounded in good nature, though he could fight, and had combative spells when he would outwrestle everybody and stood ready to thrash anybody that disputed his claims as champion. He was the hired man at the Mortons, though there was very little stated work for him and still less pay. Jed though, served for love. He never confessed it, hardly recognized it to himself, but he was the secret admirer and steadfast adorer of Miss Janet. She was the star shining biggest and brightest in the little constellation of human kind that was clustered around Jed in the small seaport town of Rockmouth.

It was very touching to see how this almost unconscious attachment of Jed invested Janet with an atmosphere of fascinating interest. Jed did not show his devotion by bringing clusters of rose-buds from a hot-house, or bunches of sheet music tied up in blue ribbon, but he would bring in wood from the shed, or get a few pounds of sugar from the grocer, or a fish from the boats just coming ashore, as he would go whistling to the post-office, his big, unwieldy hands in his baggy pockets, and bring home the daily mail for the Mortons. They could give but little pay in return. Jed never asked for more, nor if received, would it have satisfied him. When Janet said, "Thank you," Jed was fully satisfied. He had been invaluable at this time of Mrs. Morton's death. At the present moment he was supposed to be waiting for the arrival of the minister's team. Jed had been appointed to receive it, and see that the horse was properly sheltered. But while Janet had no rival in Jed's affections, there was something else interesting him profoundly. That was the sea. The storm that stirred down through the waters to their rocky bed, raising the waves, marshalling them in columns, throwing them against the land in one long, furious, foaming, crashing bombardment, stirred Jed also, and threw his soul into a tumult. He was on his way across a bleak pasture behind the Morton house—not the Morton mansion, which was something grander—purposing by a short cut to reach a corner which the minister must turn, in order to reach the barn, and there drive stableward his horse. The wind bounded forward in a furious gust. It struck Jed in the face, as if to say, "Look up!" Jed looked up, and, if there wasn't a wreck just off the yeasty shore! A vessel plainly in sight, and a wreck! Jed thought nothing more about the minister's horse. He turned round; he sprang away to the house, threw open the back door and shouted: "There's a wreck come ashore!"

And there, in another moment, stood Paulina, to confront him and reprove him. Her words brought him to himself. He hung his head sheepishly, and said in the most doleful, apologetic way, "Oh!"

"Thought you were going to look after the minister's horse, Jed. Folks all a-waitin'."

"I—I—will," said the crest-fallen Jed, hurrying away again into the storm, and in a minute, turning the corner of the house.

"But where's the wreck, Jed?" hastily screamed Paulina, fearful that she might lose her chance to learn the news, and screaming louder than Jed, when he interrupted the solemn, nervous waiting in the parlor. Jed heard her not, save that to the noise of the wind and rain in her ears, were added several new, strange, confusing notes. Paulina went back to the parlor, where lay the body that the death-storm had already wrecked, and she returned in disappointment, too, for she had not the smallest fragment of news to administer to the hunger of that aroused and expectant circle.

"Where is it? Do tell us!" nervously asked Mrs. Blakey Chase.

"Provokin'! I didn't find out nothin'!" said Paulina.

However, the parlor-assembly was not doomed to much further waiting. A heavy footstep, the noise of a stamping, as if some one were shaking off rain or mud, could easily be heard. Paulina sat near a door opening into an entry, bending her neck, almost throwing it out of joint, that she might get a good rear look in the direction of the rooms beyond this entry. She called out, "He's come! It's him!"

The stir of excitement following the announcement of the arrival of the minister, in some way was communicated from the parlor to an upper apartment, and now Pauline whispered to Mrs. Blakey Chase, "It's her!" A tall form swept into the rooms, and neither the occasion so embarrassing, nor the awkward cut of her dark mourning garments could interfere with the grace, the queenliness of her gait. It was Janet Morton, just twenty-two, when the shadow of this great sorrow overtook her and darkened all her way. Her long mourning veil was thrown back from her face. Her complexion was clear, and her features regular. Her eyes whose shade hovered somewhere between the blue of the sea at noon and the gray at sunrise, were now hidden by the long drooping lashes. Janet's face was not classified as handsome and yet it had a certain nobleness that comforted well with her carriage, and a certain sweetness also that attracted to her every child in distress and every old beggar that strayed into town.

"Ain't she a pictur'?" whispered Pauline to the other half of Blakey Chase, and the other half of Blakey Chase said, "Yes, she is, poor soul!" The young woman in black went straight to the coffin in black and took a vacant chair near its head. Parson Tapley soon stepped into the room and began the service that is a farewell to earth, and a welcome to heaven. Janet was in a daze. She had caught Jed's abrupt announcement of a wreck, and now her thoughts were in a turmoil, and that word "wreck" seemed to absorb all her thinking. But was the vessel a wreck, or was it that wasted, shattered body in the coffin, or was she, Janet, the wreck? Then there was the storm to make the confusion still greater. In the midst of it was the minister's voice saying something, but what it was she could not afterward clearly remember. A few expressions like rocks at sea projected out of the confusion of the hour, something about "sainted woman," "an excellent character," "an honored family," "lived in your midst since childhood," "gone to her reward." These disjointed fragments might have been grouped into a testimonial long enough for the face of a memorial tablet in church, but nothing more could Janet recall. The words of prayer made more impression upon her. The "Our Father" stilled her. That was God talking through human words. After awhile came a halt, a very solemn pause. Then she heard the voice of Blakey Chase, slow and sleepy, very deliberately, saying, "Friends will now please take their kerry-gees. Miss Janet Morton!"—She heard nothing more. Still in a daze, still wondering if she were not the wreck down on the shore, bruised and broken by the waves, she left her chair, stepped forward, and then halted beside the coffin. The sight of that face, so white, so still, so peaceful, shocked Janet out of her bewildering stupor, and with a heart-broken cry, "Oh, mother," she showered her hot, blinding tears upon that cold face. There was no uncertain dream now. Out of all mistiness came her soul into the light of a terrible reality, a dead mother there, a forsaken, lovely child here by the coffin side.

All the room seemed to shake and sob with Janet.

"Poor creature!" said Paulina, staring without intermission that she might catch every motion and every look of Janet. Mrs. Blakey Chase said the same thing but in these words, "If she ain't to be pried!" While the tears dripped from her cheeks, she, too, looked at Janet without one break in the stare.

What subsequently happened, stood Janet's mind something like this: a riot, short, chilling—oh! so slow—to a spot where were many white stones that seem to abruptly rise out of the ground to recognize her, and then a halt around an old long break in the ground.

"Good-night," she whispered, stooping down to the cold, peaceful face exposed once more, but nobody saw the kisses, time, for the heavy folds of Janet's dress dropped all about the still features and everything that was done. With her hand she touched the face a moment, and again and then withdrew it hesitating, as if it were a good-bye she could not make up her mind to give. She went to the family-carriage, there to take her seat in silence, and without a word she rode back to the house. She stepped into the parlor a moment. It looked very strange though very natural. The curtains were all down, and only the half-dozen chairs were there beside the sofa and tables that usually tenanted it. In the air-tight stove crackled cheerily a wood-fire. Very pleasant, it was an odd room now without the daisied carpet that had been there in shaded tones the past three days. She went upstairs soon to hear the clatter of dishes in the dining-room, a clatter that Mrs. Blakey Chase made as vigorous as possible. Things might seem "sort of lively cheering." It was a very queer, embarrassing supper, all the hungry and their kindred stopping who would, and the minister, too, was constrained to stay.

"Do stop long enough to taste a little," Mr. Tapley, kindly urged Paulina Davis.

"It will be cold a-ridin' over the mash-road," said Mrs. Blakey Chase. "Do, stop! a bite; now, do!"

The minister stopped, but it was a dreary bite. His kindly interjected remarks semi-religious and semi-social could not change the character of his feast. He was glad when it was over, while anxious to do something that would be sympathetic and helpful. As for Janet, she came while she shrank from the silence following the close of the feast. All day long she saved Mrs. Blakey Chase.

"It is dreadful lonesome here, Janet. Do let me stay," urged the kind-hearted neighbor.

"Oh, no! Your husband will want a little. It is most supper-time."

"Well, then I am coming in this evening."

"Thank you, I should be glad to have you."

The last echo of a slamming door died away and then Janet threw herself in a lounge and buried her face in her hands, sobbing "Oh, mother!" Oh, mother!

Hark! What a sharp, piercing ring of the door-bell was that which now echoed in this silent house? Janet answered it, and there in the rain stood Miss Letitia Skeele. She was as marked in her personal appearance as her father, the minister, occupying the dingy little law office marked with a dingy little sign, "Judson Skeele, attorney-at-law." She had a thin, spindly face, with small, dark, molting eyes. Her father had the same in his hatchet-face, but he pointed it differently. He always had an averted look, as if trying to get away from everybody. She tipped her sharp nose toward the sky as if trying to get above everybody. It was an audacious attempt, for she was slimmer than people generally. When Janet looked out into the rain, there was this piercing face, contemptuous and curious, inquisitive and inquisitive, but now trying to look sympathetic. The expression of Janet's face changed the moment she saw this young woman. A look came into the front which, turned into language and action, as a sign would have read, "I thoroughly dislike you and immediately dislike you." Janet was not skilled in concealing her feelings, neither did she try to hide them. In a moment her face wore a look of trouble. She was herself. "Now I am doing her injustice. I ought not to do her before she speaks. I must not count of her father's condemn her. Let me hear what she has to say."

Lavinia's expression trying to be sympathetic changed to one that went with business errand simply.

Testifying for Christ.

Contributions on the Christian Endeavor for the Week Beginning Jan. 26. Jan 4 : 2-15.

NOTHING could be more reasonable than the demand Christ makes on every one whom he saves, for public confession of him. He has a right to insist that the man whom he delivers from his sins, should testify that he is indebted to Christ for his rescue. It ought to be done voluntarily and spontaneously as a matter of gratitude. It should also be done for the sake of others. If a man had been afflicted with a deadly disease, and that all around him were afflicted suffering from the same disease, he would be unreasonably mean if he kept silent about his cure and the way by which he had gained it for their sakes, he ought to give them his deliverance and direct them to the source of healing. To confess Christ in these circumstances does not involve the personal and physical danger that he is involved, and that it involves in some heathen lands. When a man knew that he would be disinherited, disowned by his family, possibly poisoned and killed, if he avowed himself a follower of Christ, it needed heroism of a high quality to go on record. It was done, to the last extremity, by weak men and women, who could be killed, but could not be forced to disown Christ. Now, all that has endured is the ridicule of thoughtless and the sneer of the worldling. Yet even now there are some who are looking for Christ for salvation who do not have the courage to avow themselves!

The question as to the duty of a Christian should exist in the mind of every Christian. There is sometimes reluctance to take the step through lack of confidence. "I am afraid I shall not be able to keep true;" "I am afraid I shall fall under the power of the world and bring disgrace to the name of Christ;" "I am afraid to be a member of the church;" "there are people in the church whose ways I do not like;" "all these and many other reasons are given for not making profession of faith. But these will be poor excuses to make to Christ when the time comes for the final separation of the sheep and the goats. Men have been classed with the world in life, but wish to be among Christ's followers in the life to come, will need better reasons than those to give for neglect of duty. Self-dishonesty will not avail, for the promise of keeping power is freely given, and that is all that is required; fitness is not demanded, because the church is a place for growth and development; nor are we justified in making the duty by the plea of imperfections in others. The consciousness of our own frailty should prevent our expecting perfection in others.

Confession of Christ is not confined to the lips only. The mere justification by name with a church is not sufficient confession, although that is demanded. There should be a confession of the life. He who takes upon him the name of Christ is under obligation to the Christ-life. He is bound to show that religion supplies him with all the joys of life, and that he has no need of the pleasures of the world. He is bound to be cheerful, gentle, peaceable, forbearing, sympathetic, kindly, magnanimous, trustworthy—to be more and more like Christ in disposition and conduct, so that the world that sees Christ no more shall see him in him. The effect of such direct personal testimony is proof of its value. Preaching is more potent or convincing.

The Life Beyond.

[This hitherto unpublished poem by this late Dr. F. Smith, author of "America," was read at his funeral. It was composed in 1892, during a severe illness.]

To feel the mild, delicious clime,
Where summer never fades;
To breathe the glorious atmosphere,
Which sickness ne'er invades;

To reach at last that happy land,
Where tears are never known;
To see the wondrous face of Him
Who sits upon the throne;

All the great souls of all the years,
In heaven's high courts to meet;

All kindred spirits, glorified,
To join in converse sweet;

To burst the chrysalis, and soar
On love's triumphant wing
To swell the hymns of mighty praise,
The ransomed armies sing;

To wear the robes of saints in light:
To shine as shines the sun;
To hear the Saviour's welcome voice
Pronounce the glad "well done!"

And oh, the crowning heights of bliss,
Where all the glories blend,
To know the bliss, the light, the love,
Shall never, never end!

Beyond the shades of sin and woe,
With joyful speed to fly,
And in his loving arms to rest—
Oh, 'tis a gain to die.

The Prophecy on the Mount.

The Double Application of our Lord's Predictions Recorded in Matt. 24.

BY REV. RICHARD CHESTER, A.B.

FURTHER evidence that Christ's words in Matt. 24, refer to the destruction of Jerusalem in some instances and to his Second Advent in others, is furnished by an analysis of the chapter. Having predicted that the magnificent buildings should be so completely overthrown that there should not be "one stone left upon another that should not be thrown down," the Great Teacher's object manifestly appears to be to give an answer sufficiently definite, and yet not too definite to be pre-eminently practical, to the two-fold question of the disciples (verse 3): "When shall these things be? And what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the age?" They evidently expected—probably from their knowledge of the prophecy of Zechariah (chapter 14), that "the coming," and "the end" would be coincident with the overthrow of the Temple. The answer was accordingly so shaped as sufficiently to distinguish between these events, so that they should not be in anywise confounded with, or mistaken for, each other, and yet to leave the disciples in intended ignorance of the protracted interval which should elapse between the destruction of Jerusalem and the Second Advent. For always, when speaking upon the subject of the Advent—and never more clearly than in the latter part of this and in the parables of the succeeding chapter—did our blessed Lord put that event before his hearers as one which might occur during their own lifetime, and for which, therefore, they were, each of them, personally, to be always watchful and expectant. This special object of our Lord in this discourse, as also the relationship of type and antitype which exists between them, is, it seems to me, amply sufficient for any apparent intermingling of the two events, which we know to be so widely separate, both as to time and character, from each other.

The first series of events, accordingly, which the Lord, in answer to their questions, put before his disciples in connection with the overthrow of the Temple, and with his coming at the end of "the age," or dispensation, is that of the rise of false Christs, and false teachers, or prophets, and the occurrence of "wars and rumors of wars," which he warns them should be but "the beginning of sorrows," or "birth-pangs" (verses 4-11). It is remarkable, however, that while there were false Christs and teachers in the period of the world's history shortly prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, that period is conspicuous upon the page of history for the total absence of war. Consequently the rising of "nation against nation, and kingdom against kingdom" (verse 7), here distinctly foretold, is altogether inadmissible as an event connected with, or a sign preceding the, destruction of Jerusalem, and must necessarily be referred altogether to the period prior to the Second Advent. That this latter period is also to be specially distinguished by the rise of, at all events, one false Christ, several other prophecies will fully affirm.

Thus the character of this prophecy would seem to be established as referring primarily to the destruction of Jerusalem, in which some of its particulars have been partially, and so far remarkably, fulfilled; but referring especially to the Second Advent, for complete, exhaustive fulfillment.

The Poor Under Moses.*

IT has often and justly been said that the life of Israel is so entirely founded on the grace and favor of God that no distinction is made between the secular and the religious laws. Whatever their origin may have been, whether they had been part of the tribal constitution before Moses' day or not, they were all regarded as divinely given. They had been accepted as fit building stones for the great edifice of that national life in which God was to reveal himself to all mankind, and behind them all was the same Divine authority. That being so, it is not wonderful, in times like these, when the air is full of plans and theories for the reconstruction of society in the interest of the toiling masses of men, that believers in the Scripture should turn with hope to the legislation of the Old Testament. In the present state of things the material conditions of life are far more deadening and demoralizing for the multitude in civilized countries than they are in many uncivilized lands. That this should be so is intolerable to all who think and feel; and men turn with hope to a scene where God is teaching and training men, not merely in regard to their individual life, as in the New Testament, but also in regard to national life. It is seen, too, that the tone and feeling of these laws are sympathetic for the poor as no other code has been; and many maintain that, if we would only return to the provisions of these laws, the social crisis which is yet only in its beginning, and which threatens to darken and overshadow all lands, would be at once and wholly averted. Men consequently are diligently inquiring what the land tenure of ancient Israel was, what its trade laws were, how the poor were dealt with, and how and to what extent pauperism was averted or provided for.

According to the Old Testament, the ideal state of things for a people like Israel was that every household should be settled upon the land, that permanent eviction from or even alienation of the holdings should be impossible, and that the whole population should have a common interest in agriculture, that most honorable and fundamental of all human pursuits. There were, of course, some men in Israel more prominent than others, and some richer, but there was to be no impassable barrier between classes such as we find in Eastern countries where caste prevails, or in Western countries where the aristocratic principle has drawn a deep dividing line between those of "good" blood and all others. So far as is known, there were no class barriers to intermarriage. From the highest to the lowest, all were servants of Yahweh, and were consequently equal. The conditions of the land tenure were such that it was impossible, if they were respected, that large estates should accumulate in the hands of individuals, and a landless proletariat could not arise. The very rich and the very poor were alike legislated out of existence, and a sufficient provision for all was that which was aimed at. By the cycle of Sabbatic periods (the weekly Sabbath, the Sabbath year, and the year of jubilee) ample rest for the land and its inhabitants was secured; and in the limits set upon the period for which a Hebrew slave might be retained, in the release, whatever that was, which the seventh year brought to the debtor, and in the restoration of land to the impoverished owner in the year of jubilee, such a series of breakwaters were erected against the encroaching flood of pauperism, that, had they been maintained, the world would have seen for the first time a fairly civilized community in which even moderate ill-desert could not bring irretrievable ruin upon his posterity. The prodigal was hindered from selling his heritage; he could only sell the use of it for a number of years. He could not ruin himself by borrowing at extravagant rates of interest, for no one was tempted to lend him, and usury was forbidden. He might indeed run into debt and be sold into slavery along with his family, but that could only be for a few years, and then they all resumed their former position.

When Jesus was a Child.*

WHILE Mary plied her distaff and little Janna sat upon the ground at her feet, she told him over and over again the story of Jesus' childhood. How even as a jeled, a newly-born one, he had been sweeter than other babies, so strong, so well-shapen, so good, never making trouble, content to lie where he was put; how as a jonck, a suckling, he had been bubbling over with joy, pleased at all the sights and sounds around him, brave to bear the bruises his superabundant activity brought upon him, quick to recognize every tone of his mother's voice and heed all her little warnings; and soon, through all the dear stages of infancy, ever bright and full of life, yet ever obedient to his mother's voice, and ah, so full of love, his little face shining with quick response to every one who said a pleasant word to him, yet always loving his mother best of all! And then, when he had grown to be a taph, a clinging one, like little Janna herself, ah, then, how dear he had been! A real help with the little brothers and sisters as they came, one by one, into the cradle, a sturdy little servant for her in her household tasks, and yet so full of play, so wide-awake with joy, that all the village children loved to be with him. They never quarrelled with him, never; they did not even quarrel among themselves when he was playing with them, for he always knew the way to make them to be at peace in their plays, "even when he was no older than you, my Janna," Mary would add, with a soft smile and a lovely, far-away look in her wondering brown eyes.

"Was he not naughty sometimes?" Janna would ask.

"He did not always find it easy to obey, he was so full of interest in whatever he was doing," Mary would answer, "but he never disobeyed. Sometimes, when he was little, like you, and his brother James was fretful and the village children were calling him to play, or when I had work for him to do and he heard the sound of a great caravan passing through the market place, he would stand still a moment when I called him, and his face would look troubled. But even then he never needed to be called twice. In a moment he would come with his brown eyes all full of love again, ready to do his mother's will. No, my Jesus never disobeyed," his mother would say reflectively; and then she would sink into silence until the little boy said again:

"Tell me more about Jesus, please."

And then she would tell him how she had taught him all the Scripture from Adam to the Flood, as it is told in the Book of Moses, while yet he was a little clinging one, standing beside her knee; and how easily he learned to repeat the Shema, the creed, beginning, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord," and the six Psalms of the Hallel, and the first eight chapters of Leviticus, which every little boy should know before he begins to go to school.

"I can say the Shema," Janna would interpose, "and I almost know the Hallel, too." And Mary would kiss him on the brow for love of the blessed child who had once stood where he was standing, leaning against her knee. And she would go on to tell how fast Jesus learned at school, and how he loved to read in the parchment roll of the Scriptures which had come down to his mother from her father's father, and which was carefully treasured in the ark which Janna had often seen on a table in the place of honor in Mary's house. For Jesus had not been satisfied with learning what the other children learned at school, but had persuaded the Chazzan, the minister of the synagogue, to teach him to read the sacred Hebrew tongue in which the Word of the Lord had come to Moses and the prophets.

"And when he grew big he used to play in the market place," Janna would ask, to whom this, rather than the reading of Hebrew, was the object of high ambition.

"Ah, yes," Mary would answer, "and all the boys were so eager to play with him. He was a very king among them, the leader in all their games, he was so strong and so swift in running, and always played fair in everything. There was always a train of boys following him, little and big, for he was very gentle to the little ones, and would never leave the big one to tease them or tyrannize over them. All the little ones loved my Jesus when he was a boy."

"I love Jesus, too," little Janna would say, and again there would be silence while Mary pondered in her heart the events of that long-past childhood.

Scottish Characteristics.*

AN American on foot will find himself less a foreigner in Scotland than in any other country in the Old World. There is something warm and hospitable—if he knew the language well enough he would call it couthy—in the greeting that he gets from the shepherd on the moor, and the conversation that he holds with the farmer's wife in the stone cottage, where he stops to ask for a drink of milk and a bit of oat-cake. He feels that there must be a drop of Scotch somewhere in his mingled blood, or at least that the texture of his thought and feelings has been partly woven on a Scottish loom—perhaps the Shorter Catechism, or Robert Burns's poems, or the romances of Sir Walter Scott. At all events, he is among a kindred and comprehending people. They do not speak English in the same way that he does—through the nose—but they think very much more in his mental dialect than the English do. They are independent and wide awake, curious and full of personal interest. The wayside mind in Inverness or Perth runs more to muscle and less to fat, has more active vanity and less passive pride, is more inquisitive and excitable and sympathetic—in short, to use a symbolist's description, it is more apt to be red-headed—than in Surrey or Somerset. Scotchmen ask more questions about America, but fewer foolish ones. You will never hear them inquiring whether there is any good bear-hunting in the neighborhood of Boston, or whether Shakespeare is much read in the States. They have a healthy respect for our institutions, and have quite forgiven (if, indeed, they ever resented) that little affair in 1776. They are all born Liberals. When a Scotchman says he is a Conservative, it only means that he is a Liberal with hesitations.

And yet in North Britain the American pedestrian will not find that amused and somewhat condescending toleration for his peculiarities, that placid willingness to make the best of all his vagaries of speech and conduct, that he finds in South Britain. In an English town you may do pretty much what you like on a Sunday, even to the extent of wearing a billycock hat to church, and the people will put up with it from a countryman of Buffalo Bill and the Wild West Show. But in a Scotch village if you whistle in the street on a Lord's Day, though it be a Moody and Sankey tune, you will be likely to get, as I did, an admonition from some long-legged, grizzled elder:

"Young man, do ye no ken it's the Sabbath Day?"

I recognized the reproof of the righteous, an excellent oil which doth not break the head, and took it gracefully at the old man's hands. . . .

At Altnaharra, in the shadow of Ben Clebrig, there was a cozy little housew good fare, and abundant trout fishing Loch Naver and Loch Meadie. It was there that I fell in with a wandering peddler who gathered his wares from mussels in the moorland streams. I thought it must be a hard life for the man, wading day after day in the ice-cold water, groping among the coggly, sliddary stones for the shellfish, and cracking open perhaps a thousand before he could find a pearl. "Oh, yess," said he, "and it's not an easy life, and I am not saying it will be so warm and dry as lifting in a rich house. But it is the life that I fit for, and I hef my own time and thoughts to myself," and that is a fe goot thing; and then, sir, I haf found Pearl of Great Price, and I think upon it day and night."

There were three churches in Stornowall all Presbyterian, of course, and there full of pious emulation. The idea of curing an American to preach for an August Sabbath seemed to fall upon them simultaneously, and to offer the prospect of safety without too much danger. The brethren of the U. P. congregation, being a more gleg than the others, arrived first at the inn, and secured the promise of a morning sermon from Chancellor Horace Crosby. The session of the Free Church came in a body a little later, and to my father pledged himself for the evening sermon. The senior elder of the Established Kirk, a snuff-taking man and very liberate, was the last to appear, and his request for an afternoon sermon was nothing left to offer but the services of the young probationer in theology, could see that it struck him as a perilous adventure. Questions about "the fundamentals" glinted in his watery eyes, but he unburdened himself.

"Ah'm not saying that the young will not be orthodox—ahem! But ye ken, sir, in the Kirk, we are not using hymns but just the pure Psawms of Daffit, in metrical fairison. And ye know, they are fery difficult in the reating, waefer, for a young man, and one that's stranger. And if his father will just coming with him in the pulpit, to see nothing iss said amiss, that will be comforting to the congregation."

So the dear governor swallowed his laughter gravely and went surety for him. They appeared together in the church, a barnlike edifice, with two galleries way between the floor and the roof. Higher up, the pulpit stuck like a low's nest against the wall. The two sisters climbed the precipitous stair found themselves in a box so narrow one must stand perforce, while the other sat upon the only seat. In this "ridiculous" fashion they went through the vice. When it was time to preach the young man dropped the doctrines discreetly as possible upon the uptight countenances beneath him. I have gotten now what it was all about. There was a quotation from the Son of Solomon, ending with "Sweet is thy and thy countenance is comely," when it came to that, the probate eyes (if the truth must be told) searching through that sea of faces for that should be familiar to his heart to which he might make a personal citation of the Scripture passage.

Luzes Homes Laid Waste.

Another Phase of the Moslem Warfare Against all Other Faiths.

FRIENDS in New York have received from Mary Pearson Eddy, the famous medical missionary in the East a letter giving some startling news concerning the war lately begun by the Arab Moslems against the Druzes. She writes as follows:

DEAR FRIEND:—On Tuesday last a battle was fought between the Druzes on one side, and the Arabs of Jorlan, the Circassians, and fifteen hundred regular troops. There are two hundred and thirteen wounded besides the slain. These Druzes have long ruled that section of the country near to Caesarea Philippi, and refused to pay taxes, so the order for their extermination has evidently gone forth. In the villages burnt were many Christians. They begged Memdough Pasha to spare the homes. Though none of them were killed their houses are burnt. In Meidel, the first place burned, by actual count, thirty Christian homes were laid waste, and twenty Druze houses. Our little church and school house and the teachers' home also burned. We are distressed beyond all measure, as this is but the beginning. The Druze women were dragged out of our little church in Ain Kunyeh, where they had taken refuge. Little children were trampled under the horses' feet. I am hastily gathering all the garments I can, and hope in three days to start out to Merj. I am going first to our station at Meideide, and as the scene of this conflict is but a short distance from there I shall be able to render aid, I trust. We heard that yesterday they were going to burn Bargo, hardly four miles from Meideide. The Christian women are in a Moslem village temporarily on sufferance. They must be provided for, as they are absolutely destitute. The survivors of the Druzes, the wounded, the women and the children, are in this fearful winter weather living in caves on Mt. Hermon, starving, with no one in all that region to pity them. Those icy slopes, and snow-bound gorges will not long support life. The country is under martial law, and perhaps I may be able only to send supplies to the wounded, but I will do the utmost in my power to help. As to danger, my mother has me go, and I am sure of my father's permission when he returned from Egypt on Friday, and I count not my life dear to me if only I can help the wounded suffering. This is but the beginning." Miss Eddy adds that any help that may be sent will be applied toward the suffering.

Let Us Have Peace.

What! Go to war with kith and kin,
Our friends across the sea,
And maim and kill our flesh and blood
And pray on bended knee?
What! After nineteen hundred years
Of Christian faith and zeal,
Imbue our lands in brothers' blood
As we in mockery kneel?
We'll not believe it, God forbid
That men for power or gain,
Should stir up strife and calmly look
On friends and brothers slain!
May faith and wisdom rule the hour
And angry passions wane,
While "Peace on earth, good-will to men"
And truth and justice reign.

A Rajah's Gift.

The Rajah of Bardwan, India, was found with fifty bags of money before him. Each contained one thousand rupees. One part of the money he sent to Benares where he had built two heathen temples on the river in which many priests prayed for him. Another he sent to Juggernaut where the great idol was worshipped. These gifts

"It gives me pleasure to say that you have cured me of Asthma. I suffered several days at a time every year for over ten years, before I commenced Dr. Hayes' treatment. After a thorough trial I was cured, and haven't suffered a minute since. This was over five years ago. If you wish you may publish this."

G. L. CONNOR, M. D., Cokesbury, S. C.

"Schuyler is very well, and entirely free from Asthma and the other complaints that formerly troubled him so much. For the past two years he has had no return of his Asthma, and is strong and well, and can do his ten or twenty miles on his bicycle. As for myself I have had no return of Asthma for several years, and in fact have never had since the first year of using your medicine (1888)."

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

SAY SO.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Psalms 107: 2, "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so."

AN overture, an antiphon, a doxology is this chapter, and in my text David calls for an outspoken religion, and requests all who have been rescued and blessed, no longer to hide the splendid facts, but to recite them, publish them, and as far as possible, let all the world know about it. "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so." There is a sinful reticence which has been almost canonized. The people are quite as outspoken as they ought to be on all subjects of politics, and are fluent and voluble on the Venezuelan question, and bi-metalism, and tariffs, high and low and remodeled, and female suffrage, and you have to skilfully watch your chance if you want to put into the active conversation a modest suggestion of your own; but on the subject of divine goodness, religious experience, and eternal blessedness they are not only silent, but boastful of their reticence. Now, if you have been redeemed of the Lord, why do you not say so? If you have in your heart the pearl of great price, worth more than the Koh-i-noor among Victorian jewels, why not let others see it? If you got off the wreck in the breakers, why not tell of the crew and the stout life-boat that safely landed you? If from the fourth story you are rescued in time of conflagration, why not tell of the fireman and the ladder down which he carried you? If you have a mansion in heaven awaiting you, why not show the deed to those who may by the same process get an emerald castle on the same boulevard? By the last two words of my text David calls upon all of us who have received any mercy at the hand of God to stop impersonating the asylums for the dumb, and in the presence of men, women, angels, devils, and all worlds, "say so."

In these January days, thousands of ministers and private Christians are wondering about the best ways of starting a revival of religion. I can tell you a way of starting a revival, continental, hemispheric, and world-wide. You say a revival starts in heaven. Well, it starts in heaven just as a prosperous harvest starts in heaven. The sun must shine, and the rains must descend, but unless you plow and sow and cultivate the earth you will not raise a bushel of wheat or a peck of corn between now and the end of the world. How, then, shall a universal revival start? By all Christian people telling the story of their own conversion. Let ten men and women get up next week in your prayer meeting and, not in a conventional or canting or doleful way, but in the same tone they employ in the family or place of business, tell the story of their conversion, and the revival will begin then and there, if the prayer meeting has not been so dull as to have failed to attract the converts whom it was foreordained from all eternity that they should be there. There are so many of us who have converted that we want to hear all kinds, so that our own case may be helped. It always puts me back to hear only one kind of experience, such as a man gives when he tells of his Pauline conversion,—how he was knocked senseless, and then had a vision and heard voices, and after a certain number of days of horror got up and shouted for joy. All that discourages me, for I was never knocked senseless, and I never had such a sudden burst of religious rapture that I lost my equilibrium. But after awhile a Christian man got up in some meeting and told us how he was brought up by a devout parentage, and had always been thoughtful about religious things, and gradually the peace of the Gospel came into his soul like the dawn of the morning,—no perceptible difference between moment and moment—but after awhile all perturbation settled down into a hope that had consoled and strengthened him during all the vicissitudes of a lifetime. I said, "That is exhilarating; that was my experience," and so I was strengthened. In another prayer meeting a man got up and told us how he once hated God, and went through all the round of iniquity, until we were all on nettles lest he should go too much into the particulars, but one day he was by some religious power hurled flat, and then got up a Christian, and had ever since been going around with a Baxter Bible with large flaps under his arm, a floating evangelist. Well, under this story many are not helped at all, for they know they never hated God, and they were never dissolute. But after awhile some Christian woman arises and says, "I have nothing extraordinary to tell; yet I think the cares of life, the anxieties about my children, and two graves opened in our family plot, made me feel the need of God, and weak and helpless and heart-broken, I flung myself upon his mercy, and I feel what the Bible calls the 'peace of God which passeth all understanding,' and I ask your prayers that I may live nearer to the Christ who has done so much for me." I declare that before that woman got through we were all crying, not bitter tears, but tears of joyful emotion, and in three days, in that neighborhood, all the ice had gone out of the river in a spring-time freshet of salvation. "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so."

I have but little interest in what people say about religion as an abstraction, but I have illimitable interest in what people say about what they have personally felt of religion. It was an expression of his own gratitude for personal salvation which led Charles Wesley, after a season of great despondency about his soul, and Christ had spoken pardon, to write that immortal hymn:—

Oh, for a thousand tongues to sing
My great Redeemer's praise.

It was after Abraham Lincoln had been comforted in the loss of "Tad," the bright boy of the White House, that he said, "I now see as never before the preciousness of God's love in Jesus Christ, and how we are brought near to God as our Father by him."

What a thrill went through the meeting in Portland, Oregon, when an ex-Attorney General of the United States arose and said, "I have just got up and asked the prayers of God's people. I feel now perfectly satisfied. The burden is rolled off and all gone, and I feel that I could run or fly into the arms of Jesus Christ."

What a record for all time and eternity was made by Gellacius, the play-actor, in the theatre at Heliopolis. A burlesque of Christianity was put upon the stage. In derision of the ordinance of baptism a bathtub, filled with water, was put upon the stage, and another actor, in awful blasphemy, dipped Gellacius, pronouncing over him the words, "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." But coming forth from the burlesqued baptism, he looked changed, and was changed, and he cried out to the audience, "I am a Christian; I will die as a Christian." Though he was dragged out and stoned to death, they could not drown the testimony made under such awful circumstances, "I am a Christian; I will die as a Christian." "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so."

What a confirmation would come if all who had answers to prayers would speak out! If all merchants in tight places because of hard times would tell how, in response to supplication, they got the money to pay the note. If all farmers in time of drought would tell how, in answer to prayer, the rain came just in time to save the crop. If all parents who prayed for a wandering son to come home would tell how, not long after, they heard the boy's hand on the latch of the front door.

There lingers on this side of the river that divides earth and heaven, ready at any time to cross over, the apostle of prayer for this century, Jeremiah Calvin Lanphier, the founder of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, and if he should put on his spectacles and read this, I salute him as more qualified than any man since Bible times in demonstrating what prayer can do. Dear Brother Lanphier! The high heavens are full of his fame. Having announced a meeting for 12 o'clock, September 23, 1857, he sat in the upper room on Fulton street, New York, waiting for people to come. He waited for a half hour, and then a footfall was heard on the steps, and after awhile in all six persons arrived; but the next day twenty, and the next day forty, and from that time to this, for over thirty-eight years, every day, Sabbath excepted, that Fulton Street Prayer Meeting has been a place where people have asked prayer and answers to prayer have been announced, and the throb of that great heart of supplication has thrilled not only into the heavens, but clear around the world, more than any spot on earth. That has been the place where the redeemed of the Lord said so!

Let the same outspokenness be employed toward those by whom we have been personally advantaged. We wait until they are dead before we say so. Your parents have planned for your best interests all these years. They may sometimes, their nervous system used up by the cares, the losses, the disappointments, the worries of life, be more irritable than they ought to be, and they probably have faults which have become oppressive as the years go by. But those eyes, long before they took on spectacles, were watching for your welfare, and their hands, not as smooth and much more deeply lined than once, have done for you many a good day's work. Life has been to them more of a struggle than you will ever know about, and much of the struggle has been for you, and how much they are wrapped up in your welfare you will never appreciate. Have you by word or gift or behavior expressed your thanks? Or if you cannot quite get up to say it face to face, have you written it in some holiday salutation? The time will soon pass and they will be gone out of your sight, and their ears will not hear and their eyes will not see. If you owe them any kindness of deed or any words of appreciation, why do you not say so? How much we might all of us save ourselves in the matter of regrets if we did not delay until too late an expression of obligation that would have made the last years of earthly life more attractive. The grave is deaf, and epitaphs on cold marble cannot make reparation.

In conjugal life the honeymoon is soon past, and the twain take it for granted that each is thoroughly understood. How dependent on each other they become, and the years go by, and perhaps nothing is said to make the other fully understand that sense of dependence. Impatient words sometimes come forth, and motives are misinterpreted, and it is taken as a matter of course that the two will walk the path of life side by side until about the same time their journey shall be ended; but some sudden and appalling illness unloosens the right hands that were clasped years before at the altar of orange blossoms, the parting takes place, and among the worst of all the sorrows is that you did not often, if you ever did at all, tell her or tell him how indispensable she was, or how indispensable he was to your happiness, and that in some plain, squawking, long ago, you did not ask for forgiveness for infirmities and neglects, and by some unlimited utterance make it understood that you fully appreciated the fidelity and reinforcement of many years. And how many such have to lament the rest of their lives, "Oh, if I had only said so!"

My subject takes a wider range. The Lord has hundreds of thousands of people among those who have never joined his army because of some high ideal of what a Christian should be, or because of a fear that they may not hold out, or because of a spirit of procrastination. They have never publicly professed Christ. They have as much right to the sacraments and as much right to all the privileges of the church as thousands who have for years been enrolled in church membership, and yet they have made no positive utterance by which the world may know they love God and are on the road to heaven. They are redeemed of the Lord, and yet do not say so. Oh, what an augmentation would be if by some divine impulse those outsiders should become insiders. Tell you what would bring them to the right places, and perhaps nothing else will. Days of persecution! If they were compelled to take sides as between Christ and his enemies, they would take the side of Christ, and the faggots and the instruments of torture, and the anathemas of earth and hell would not make them blanch. Martyrs are made out of such stuff as they are. But let them not wait for such days as I pray to God may never come. Drawn by the sense of fairness and justice and obligation, let them show their colors. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so!

This chapter from which I take my text mentions several classes of persons who ought to be outspoken; among them those who go on a journey. What an opportunity you have, you who spend much of your time on rail-trains or shipboard, whether on lake or river or sea. Spread the story of God's goodness as your own redemption wherever you go. You will have many a long ride beside some one whom you will never see again, some one who is waiting for one word of rescue or consolation. Make every train and steamer a moving palace of souls. Casual conversations have harvested a great host for God. There are many Christian workers in pulpits, in mission stations, in Sabbath Schools, in universities of places who are doing their best for Christ and without any recognition. They are alone, and no one cheers them. It is a hard all the reward they get is harsh criticism, or repulse, or their own fatigue. Have you ever heard of any good they have done, let them know about it. If you have some one benefited by their alms, or their prayers, or their cheering word, go and tell them. They may be almost ready to give up their mission. They may be almost despair because of the seeming lack of results. One word from you may be a donation that will start them on the work of their lifetime. A Christian man said to her pastor, "My usefulness

the. I do not know why my life is spared any longer, because I can do no good." Then the pastor replied, "You do me great good every Sabbath." She asked, "How do I do you any good?" and he replied, "In the first place, you are always in your seat in the church, and that helps me, and in the second place, you are always wide awake and alert, looking right up into my face, and that helps me; and in the third place, I often see tears running down your cheeks, and that helps me." What a good thing he did not wait until she was dead before he said so!

There are hundreds of ministers who do hard work to make sermons because no one expresses any appreciation. They are afraid of making him vain. The moment the benediction is pronounced they get on their heels and go out. Perhaps I was a subject on which he had put special pains. He sought for the right text, and then did his best to put the old thought into some new shape. He had prayed that it might go to the hearts of the people. He had added to the argument the most vivid illustrations he could think of. He had delivered all with a power that left him nervously exhausted. Five hundred people may have been blessed by it, and resolved upon a higher life and nobler purposes. Yet all he hears is the clank of the pew door, or the shuffling feet in the aisle, or some remark about the weather, the last resort of inanity. Why did not that man come up and say frankly, "You have done me good?" Why did not some woman come up and say, "I shall go home to take up the burden of the more cheerfully?" Why did they not tell him so? I have known ministers, the nervous reaction that comes to some after the delivery of a sermon with no seeming result, to go home and roll on the floor in agony.

But to make up for this lack of outspoken religion there needs to be and will be a great Day, when amid the solemnities and grandeur of a listening universe God will "say so." No statistics can state how many mothers have rocked cradles and hovered over infantile sicknesses and brought up their families to manhood and womanhood, and launched them upon useful and successful lives, and yet never received one "Thank you" that amounted to anything. The daughters became queens of social life or were affianced in highest realms of prosperity; the sons took the first honors of the university and became radiant in monetary or professional spheres. How the secret of all that uplifted maternal influence must come out. Society did not say so; the Church did not say so; the world did not say so, but on that day of all other days, the Last Day, God will say so.

There are men to whom life is a grind and a conflict, hereditary tendencies to be overcome, accidental environments to be endured, appalling opposition to be met and conquered, and they never so much as had a rose pinned to their coat lapel in admiration. They never had a song dedicated to their name. They never had a book presented to them with a complimentary word on the fly-leaf. All they have to show for their lifetime battle is scars. But on the Last Day the story will come out, and that life will be put in holy and transcendent rhythm, and their courage and persistence and faith and victory will not only be announced but rewarded. "These are they that came out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." God will say so!

We miss one of the chief ideas of a Last Judgment. We put into the picture the fire, and the smoke, and the earthquake, and the descending angels, and the uprising dead, but we omit to put into the picture that which makes the Last Judgment a magnificent opportunity. We omit the fact that it is to be a day of glorious explanation and commendation. The first justice that millions of unrewarded, and unrecognized, and unappreciated men and women get will be on that day, when services that never called forth so much as a newspaper line of finest pearl or diamond type, as the printers term it, shall be called up for coronation. That will be the day of enthronement for those whom the world called "Nobodies." Joshua, who commanded the sun and moon to stand still, needs no Last Judgment to get justice done him, but those men do need a Last Judgment who at times, in all armies, under the most violent assault, in obedience to command, themselves stood still. Deborah, who encouraged Barak to bravery in battle against the oppressors of Israel, needs no Last Judgment to get justice done her, for thousands of years have clapped her applause. But the wives who in all ages have encouraged their husbands in the battles of life, women whose names were hardly known beyond the next street or the next farmhouse, must have God say to them, "You did well! You did gloriously!" God will say so.

And now I close with giving my own personal testimony, for I must not enjoin upon others that which I decline myself to do. Born at Boundbrook, New Jersey, of a parentage as pious as the world ever saw, I attest before earth and heaven that I have always felt the elevating and restraining influence of having had a good father and a good mother, and if I am able to do half as well for my children as the old folks did for me I will be thankful forever. The years of my life passed on until, at about eighteen years of age, I felt the pressure of eternal realities, and after prayer and religious counsel I passed into what I took to be a saved state, and joined the church, and I attest before earth and heaven that I have found it a most helpful and inspiring association. I like the companionship so well that I cannot be satisfied if I have a day less of it than all eternity. After graduating at collegiate and theological institutions I had the hands of ten or twelve good men put upon my head in solemn ordination, at Belleville, New Jersey, and I attest before earth and heaven that the work of the Gospel ministry has been delightful, and I expect to preach until my last hour. Many times I have passed through deep water of bereavement, and but for the divine promise of heavenly reunion I would have gone under, but I attest before earth and heaven that the comfort of the Gospel is high, deep, glorious, eternal. Many times have I been maligned and my work misrepresented, but all such falsehood and persecution have turned out for my advantage and enlarged my work, and I attest before earth and heaven that God has fulfilled to me the promises, "Lo! I am with you always," and "The gates of hell shall not prevail against you."

For the cheer of younger men in all departments, let me say you will come out all right if you mind your own business and are patient. The assault of the world is only being rubbed down by a rough Turkish towel, and it improves the circulation and makes one more vigorous. While the future holds for me many mysteries which I do not pretend to solve, I am living in expectation that when my poor work is done I shall go through the gates and meet my Lord and all my kindred who have preceded me, a precious group whom I miss more and more as the years go by, and I attest before earth and heaven that the glories of the heavenly world illumine my pathway. In courts of law the witness may kiss the Bible or lift his right hand in oath, but as I have often kissed the dear old Book, I now lift my right hand and take oath by Him that liveth forever and ever that God is good, and that the Gospel is a mighty consolation in days of trouble, and that the best friend a man ever had is Jesus, and that heaven is absolutely sure to those who trust and serve the blessed Redeemer: to whom be glory and dominion and victory and song, and chorus of white-robed immortals, standing on seas of glass mingled with fire. Amen and amen!

An Oriental Barber.

His Open-Air Workshop a Sight Familiar to Travelers in Eastern Lands.

In the warm climate of the Orient, a multitude of avocations which, with us, are followed indoors, are performed in the open air. In the great bazaars of Palestine, Syria and Asia Minor, a majority of the merchants have their wares exposed outdoors, and they, with possibly one or more assistants (whenever the establishment is of sufficient consequence to require more than a single attendant) ensconce themselves in some shady nook or recess or beneath some dingy awning, while the purchaser leisurely strolls along and examines their wares. Great stocks of valuable shawls, wrappings of silk and woven stuffs, cotton and linen, silverware and gold, antiques in brass, copper and other metals, swords and all kinds of weapons, are sold in the open air in many shops of Damascus, Aleppo, Beyrout, Smyrna, Jerusalem and even Constantinople. Workmen ply their trade on the sidewalk in little tents or booths, skilled artisans in precious metal as well as the humble maker of sandals.

Not the least picturesque of these alfresco Oriental workmen is the barber who may be frequently seen plying his calling in the picturesque fashion shown in the colored illustration on the first page of this issue. In all Eastern countries the barber is a much respected social functionary. Yet shaving is by no means the comfortable luxury in the East that it is among the Western people. Our later civilization has introduced many luxurious accompaniments to the art tonsorial that are totally unknown in the East, where the same appliances are still employed that have been used for many centuries. An Oriental barber shop or booth is usually found on some street aside from the main thoroughfare. Here the white-robed and turbaned attendant waits upon his patron, seating him upon a chair or stool, not unlike a "tabourette" or diminutive table, such as is used in Syrian and Turkish homes. Tying a large towel about the neck of the sitter, the barber is ready to begin. Usually an attendant holds a platter or water-dish while the operation is in progress. The upright position is not calculated to add to the comfort of the patron, but this is atoned for, to some extent, by the skill and deftness with which the razor is handled by the barber himself.

In the city of Damascus (from which our picture is taken), one usually finds the true type of the Oriental barber plying his trade in the near neighborhood of the bazaars, his picturesque-looking cabinet, with its screened and latticed front, inviting the curious stranger. Certain classes in the East shave the head or at least a portion of its surface, at regular intervals, and others the face alone, while still others approximate more closely to the European style of toilet. Shaving the head was customary among the Hebrews as an act of mourning, and was probably performed much in the same manner as is now usual in those latitudes, the operator rubbing the scalp gently and comfortably with his fingers moistened with water for a considerable time, and afterward applying the razor and shaving from the crown downward.

With few exceptions, the ancient nations attached a great value to the possession of a beard. In Egypt, however, it was the common practice to shave the hair of the face and head. Herodotus mentions it as a peculiarity that they permitted the hair and beard to grow as a sign of mourning. It is supposed that, during their captivity, the Israelites preserved their beards. Assyrians, Amalekites, Canaanites, and Ara-bians were all more or less bearded in early times. One of the very oldest traditions is that Adam was created with a beard.

Modern Mohammedans no longer regard the beard as a sacred thing, as once did the followers of Islam. Sultan Selim, in the sixteenth century, shattered all traditions by shaving off his beard, and since those days the Moslem has become more and more latitudinarian in this respect, so that one to-day cannot tell, by the mere presence or absence of a beard, whether a man be Moslem or Christian.

Friends of the Friendless.

HOW the Christian people of Paterson, N. J., are combining for the help of the friendless and destitute in their neighborhood, was told in last week's issue of this journal. We give on this page portraits of two of the leaders of the beneficent movement.

Rev. J. H. Robertson is the Superintendent of the Home where the destitute men are fed and lodged and where they have the opportunity to earn, by labor in the wood-yard a portion of the cost of their temporary maintenance. The directors of the institution were well aware how much the success of their effort depended on the character of the man in whom the executive authority was vested, and their choice has proved their wisdom. Mr. Robertson is a man of kindly, sympathetic nature, heartily believing in the principles adopted in the institution and especially fertile in expedients for helping the needy to obtain honest employment. The second portrait is that of Dr. Sherburne R. Merrill, the kindly physician through whose munificence the workers have been provided with a commodious and convenient edifice in which to carry on their work. It is estimated that Dr. Merrill's gift is worth fully fifteen thousand dollars. It has been named after him, "The Merrill Home," and it will form a memorial to him which will be far more noble than the costliest monument that could be reared in his honor. It will tell to future generations of the generosity and unselfish liberality of the man who "considered the poor" and gave of his substance for their relief. Mr. Merrill's gift is another instance of that wiser spirit, which this generation has evinced, that is not content with mere charity, but tries intelligently to understand the real need of the poor and meet it efficiently.

The Dead Girl's Bible.

"I lately learned," says Pastor Luigi, of Beziers, France, "an interesting fact that might easily have passed without notice. A little girl had attended our Sunday School for some time. She gained a Bible as a reward, which she read regularly and loved greatly. She was taken away by death not long since, and now the parents treasure the Bible left behind, and in their turn read it. Some of their neighbors tried to dissuade them from so doing, saying it was a bad and dangerous book, but they replied: 'No; we know the book and it is excellent. Our little one found in it her greatest happiness, and we keep it carefully in memory of her.'"

The Power of Jesus.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 2. Luke 5: 17-26. Golden Text, Luke 5: 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE have already seen how the Lord Jesus was strengthened, not weakened by his sore temptation. He conquered by the Word, "It is written," and returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee. His experience of rejection and of persecution at Nazareth in no way weakened this power which lay, not in the human nature which he had taken, but in the Holy Ghost who had come upon him at his baptism, and the Father who dwelt in him, and did the works (John 14: 10) through him as a human instrument. At Nazareth, the Word of God in his lips had had a wonderful effect, even on those who so soon afterwards were filled with wrath against him, and sought to take his life. But he went thence to Capernaum, and the same unabated power of God was manifest: "they were astonished at his teaching [or doctrine]; for his word was with authority." (Luke 4: 31, 32 R.V.) And when he cast out an unclean spirit at the same time, "amazement came upon them all, and they spake together one with another, saying, for with authority and power he commandeth the unclean spirits, and they come out." Thus the Lord Jesus taught and healed in the power of the Holy Spirit; demons testifying to him; multitudes following him, everyone on whom he laid hands healed by him. And yet he shunned the multitudes, and passed on into "other cities also," true to his vocation: "therefore was I sent." And he wrought miracles: the multitude of fishes was one, and healed the miserable, outcast, hopeless lepers. And great multitudes came together to hear, and to be healed of their infirmities. But Jesus did not court or encourage such popularity. He withdrew himself into the desert and prayed. It is the instinct of one who lives near to God to escape from the multitudes. When the venerable W. Aitken of Pendeen, one of the great soulwinners, and perhaps one of the holiest men of the last generation, was just in the height of some blessed revival, he would, quite suddenly, without giving any reason for it, but simply the words "My work is done here," go right away from the crowds which were hanging upon his lips, and get alone with God. This was the true secret of his holy life and of the power of his presence.

What is this Word?

But such a movement as this could not fail to arouse the suspicion and the jealousy of the religious teachers of the day. On one of those days as he was teaching, "there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by which were come out of every town [or village] of Galilee and Judea and Jerusalem." It seems to have been a concerted gathering of the religious leaders for the purpose of investigating, and passing judgment upon this new, and by them unauthorized, leader. But if they did not authorize him, there was an authority and a power with him which they could neither deny, understand, nor explain away—"the power of the Lord was with him to heal" (Luke 5: 17, R.V.). Who can tell what the Lord Jesus may have suffered in having around him such uncongenial spirits! What must it have been for him, sensitive to the last degree to all that was not of God, all that was untrue, unkind, unholy—to be always surrounded by critical, jealous, malignant critics, watching his every word, that they might gain some advantage over him!

While the Lord was teaching under these circumstances, a bad case of paralysis was brought to him. The patient was a man, probably of somewhat large proportions, as it took four men to carry him on the rug or quilt, of which people in the East made their bed. They were persistent, and finding no possibility of bringing him near enough to attract the eye of Jesus, they hauled him up upon the flat roof, and began to uncover enough of the tiles to let down the bed with its burden before Jesus. The critics were looking on to see what would happen, but Jesus was Looking Elsewhere.

With his eye upon his Father, he was looking to know how these men, the sick one and his friends, stood in their relations to his Father. And Jesus saw what the multitude did not see, that they were dealing with God, unlike the men of Nazareth who had dealt only with what was visible. He saw their faith, and said: "Man, thy sins are forgiven thee." It was just what the critics were watching for; this gave them their opportunity. Knowing well enough that their own sins were not forgiven, they concluded, as many in the same circumstances do now, that no man can be sure of the pardon of sin. "The scribes and the Pharisees began to reason, saying, 'Who is this that speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God alone?'" O how many there are who reason when they ought to learn! O how few will humble themselves to be taught of God! How few treat their God as though he were really greater and wiser than they are! Poor, fallen human nature arrogates to itself the right and the power to judge its maker! Here were men in the presence of One whose presence they could not but feel, whose words possessed a power patent to them all, yet inexplicable on any human ground. He bore the marks which had been prophesied of the Messiah (Isa. 35, 53), and yet, instead of weighing the question whether, after all, this were not the promised Messiah, they, taking it for granted that this was not the Christ, accuse him who should judge them at the last day of speaking blasphemies. They knew not what they did.

Why reason rather than enquire? Jesus was near enough to answer any question and ready enough to meet any real enquirer. He answered Nicodemus and even such a one as the woman of Samaria as soon as she learned to listen to him. Why do men now reason instead of coming straight to Jesus with their difficulties? Our own hearts are obtuse they need light brought in to them, to see themselves, how much more to see and understand the Son of God! Thousands are perishing in this and other lands because they will not give up reasoning and come as enquirers to the Lord. They will not learn, they will not come down low enough to be taught of God. "The world by wisdom knew not God (1. Cor. 1: 21) and by wisdom never will know God." It is written by the prophet, "They shall be all taught of God" (John 6: 45). And yet thousands and thousands are seeking to be self-taught in the things which are above them, and out of their reach. Men must humble themselves to learn of God, as well as to walk with him (Micah 6: 8).

The power of Jesus was manifest in his reading what was going on in their hearts, and he said, "What reason ye in your hearts, whether it is easier to say to the sick of the palsy, thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, rise up and walk. But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power [or authority] upon earth to forgive sins (he said to the sick of the palsy), I say unto thee, arise and take up thy couch, and go unto thine house." There was abundant evidence of the authority of Jesus. He had driven his critics into a corner, for immediately the sick man rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own home, glorifying God." For the moment the critics were silenced, the whole company "were amazed, and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, 'We have seen strange things to-day.'"

Filled with fear. Why? Because God had come near to them, and they could not deny it. Wherever the power of God is manifest to those who know him not, they are afraid. Many of those who deny that the Lord heals the bodies of those who trust in him, are really afraid themselves of coming into close contact with him. They would rather deal with man than with God, they would rather get benefit from the working of some material thing, a drug, a bandage, an operation, etc., than wholly and solely by the still, solemn power of the hand which made them.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

"I SAY UNTO THEE, ARISE."

Galilee, from which Jesus could go conveniently in the boats of his friends, to the various points from which to commence his preaching journeys into other parts of the country. Another feature which probably weighed with him in choosing it for his headquarters, was that several of his followers lived there and that the synagogue was under the charge of Jairus. One of his first acts after settling there, was to attach four of the men of the town Peter and Andrew, James and John, two pairs of brothers, permanently to himself. Luke tells the story of their choice with more detail than the other Evangelists. From his book it appears, that Jesus after using Peter's boat as a pulpit from which to preach to the people gathered on the shore, worked a miracle in bringing fishes into the net of the ship. The miracle, following the teaching, seems to have decided all the four men who were partners in the business, to cast in their lot with Christ. Following this, although Luke reverses the order, was the healing of the demoniac in the synagogue of Capernaum and the healing of Peter's mother-in-law and many others. The people would gladly after such an exhibition of his power have kept Jesus among them, but there were many reasons why he wished to go away for a time. He therefore went on a tour through Galilee, leaving them in the height of their excitement. There was, however, apparent everywhere the same disposition as in Capernaum to pay attention to the miracles rather than the teaching. Men could not be induced to lift their eyes from the wonder to the wonder-worker. It must have been inexpressibly saddening to Christ to see how the miracles were failing of their purpose. He returned to Capernaum, and as soon as it was known that he was in the city, the crowds gathered around him and he resumed his teaching. While it was in progress, the incident of the lesson occurred. A sick man, suffering from palsy, a general term covering all forms of paralysis, was brought to him for healing. As it was impossible to make a way through the crowd to get to Jesus, his friends carried him up the staircase, which in many Oriental houses leads outside the house from the ground to the roof. They would know that Jesus would probably be in the quadrangle around which houses of the better class were built, and removing the temporary covering, lowered the man to the feet of Christ. He was evidently gratified at the faith in him they displayed. He rewarded them in a way they did not expect. He forgave the man's sins, evidently wishing to force the issue he had failed to get them to consider. Naturally, his authority was challenged, and then he showed his authority by working the miracle. Reversing thus the process they looked for, he compelled them to perceive the position that in his opinion miracles held in his mission. He wanted the doctors and Pharisees to understand that the miracles were his credentials.

They sought to bring him in. A Boston journal reports the conversion of a young scapegrace whose misconduct was a great grief to his pious mother. She did her utmost to train him in the right way but he was persistent in wrong doing and finally he ran away from home. But she never despaired of his salvation. To people who condoled with her she would say, "It will all come right. Tom will be a good man yet. I have taken him to Christ." She died without seeing any fruit of her faith but the very next week a letter arrived from her son telling her news that would have gladdened her heart if she had lived, to read it. The editor of the paper opened it as her executor and read that her son had become a Christian.

When he saw their faith. It was remarkable how all through Christ's career he rejoiced when any one showed faith in him. There seemed to be in his nature a pathetic longing for the trust and confidence of men. "Believest thou that I am able to do this?" he asked on one occasion and granted the petition instantly when assured of the faith. A story is told of Sir William Napier, that illustrates this delight in faith. He met a child, in one of his walks, sobbing bitterly over the remains of a pitcher lying on the sidewalk. He tried to comfort the little one, but she said, "Can you mend my pitcher?" The great man admitted that he could not, but said he could buy her another. He found, however, that he had not a penny in his pockets. He told the child he would go and get some money and then they would buy a new pitcher. She looked up joyfully and dried her tears. When he reached home a deputation was waiting for him to carry him off to an important meeting. But he would not go. "No," he said, "I have an appointment I must keep," and he hurried away to meet his little friend. In relating the incident afterward he said, "I could not disappoint her; she trusted in me so implicitly."

Thy sins are forgiven thee. It is related of a great surgeon in a London hospital, who was famous for his skill in performing a certain delicate operation, that he once passed through a severe struggle which almost unmanned him. At the time there was no living man in the country who would undertake the operation, in which the slightest failure of nerve would lose the patient's life. He was informed that a patient was in the hospital on whom the operation would have to be performed. Without seeing the man, he gave instructions as to the diet and course of treatment to be pursued to fit him for the ordeal. Then on the day fixed for the operation he went to the hospital to perform it. As he entered his room a friend called him aside. "I think," he said, "I had better prepare you for a shock. The man of whom you are going to operate, is Randolph." The surgeon turned pale and sank into a chair. Randolph was a man who had done the surgeon, a few years before, the most grievous wrong one man can do another. After a few minutes the surgeon recovered his composure. "Does he know that I am to operate?" he asked. "Yes," said his friend, "he is penitent and he believes that you have so much magnanimity that you will do your best for him." The surgeon looked surprised. "What faith he must have!" he said. He went into the operating-room and looked down at the man, he said, "Are you willing to put your life in my hands?" The patient turned a timid glance upon him and said, "Yes, you have a noble nature. I can trust you." "Then," said the surgeon, "before I begin, I forgive you the wrong you did me, I am ready to begin. God help me!"

MISSOURI'S WONDERFUL CAVE.

Our Sunday School Missionary Describes a Journey Through Vast Underground Chambers and Avenues—Sunday School Work During 1895.

GUIDES AT THE ENTRANCE OF THE HANNIBAL CAVE.

AS this is the last letter I shall write you in the old year, I record the goodness of God in preserving me during the year, in traveling 7,522 miles in all kinds of weather. The part of my field traversed has been much more hilly, and the roads much more muddy than those of last year. Having referred in former letters more particularly to the Sunday Schools organized and aided, I now mention, with thankfulness to God, the large number of persons who have promised to meet me in heaven, reaching into hundreds. The matter of sound conversions is a point I aim to press in every sermon and address, encouraging superintendents and teachers to labor for this result, and to lay great stress upon the doctrine, "Ye must be born again," and I point out to the unconverted that this is to be obtained by turning from their sins to God, and trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ; and by his grace I hope to meet many sinners in heaven to whom I have preached in private and in public, and to whom I have distributed Bibles and Testaments, Gospel books, tracts, and papers.

An experience new to me occurred while on a brief tour in Texas, during which I attended a conference of missionaries of the American Sunday School Union at Dallas. After the conference, while visiting Gatesville, I preached to about two hundred colored convicts at the State Reformatory, who gave close attention to the Word of life. It was my first experience in preaching to an audience of convicts.

Some physical features of my field (North Missouri), may be of special interest, and answer a number of inquiries. It is a fertile and beautiful country, producing corn, wheat, oats, rye, garden vegetables, apples and small fruits in great abundance. The grasses are timothy, clover, millet, etc. Blue grass is a spontaneous growth over the larger portion of it, rivaling, it is said, the celebrated blue grass region of Kentucky. It is well watered by nature, and rich prairies and ample timber at convenient distances, spread over its entire extent. All kinds of domestic animals are raised in great abundance, and poultry in astonishing quantities. Its area is larger than the Kingdom of Israel in the reign of David. Two days ago, I visited one of its natural curiosities—the Hannibal Cave, about a mile and a half from where I write. A company of seven led by a guide, each of us provided with coal-oil lamps or torches explored its avenues, viewed its arches, rooms, crags and caverns, and admired its beautiful cream-colored stone in novel and wonderful formations. We walked its "Grand Avenue," which is from three to ten feet wide under foot, expanding on the sides and sloping to the top like a railway coach, probably twenty feet or more to the ceiling. I do not know its length, but it occupied about an hour to walk back and forth from the beginning to the end of this main passage, and view its scenery and numerous intersecting avenues, only a few of which were entered by us. The cave presented more delightful surprises and curiosities than any natural scenery I ever beheld. Here was a "parlor," there a "piano," yonder an "alligator," and beyond an "elephant," etc., stone formations more or less resembling the objects named. I thought of the cave of Aduham and David's four hundred.

Our guide told me he had seen nine hundred persons in this cave at once. All could easily be hidden so that no one could have seen from the outside. I say we explored the cave; but only in part. It has never been fully explored so great is its extent, and so numerous its avenues or passages. Many of them can be followed considerable distances with safety, others are narrow and perilous.

The cave is a favorite resort in summer for Sunday Schools and picnics for many miles around. Nearby is another great cave with much beautiful scenery, and similar in the color of its stone—cream or light buff color. The two are believed to be connected by a subterranean passage, undiscovered as yet. They are under large bluffs on the west bank of the Mississippi River. The photos I enclose are interior views of the second cave, called La Baum, after an early settler.

This magnificent State now has, doubtless, one million children and persons under twenty years of age; and with its boundless resources it is impossible to tell how vast a population the State is capable of supporting. I adopt the motto and prayer of one of its poets—

Missouri for Jesus! Oh, grant it, dear Lord.

A Leper's Retreat.

Miss H. Riddell, of Kumanato, Japan, says: "There is more suffering from leprosy than anyone knows. The very existence of these poor creatures is often kept secret even from friends of the leper's family. One case will serve as a specimen of many. A young girl was married to a leper without knowing that her husband was so afflicted when they were married. After a time she, too, became affected with leprosy, and returned to her parent's house to die. They were quite poor working-people; and one day a gentleman who was out shooting, stopped at their cottage and asked for some tea. He stayed talking with the two old people for a little while, and he noticed that the woman filled a large cup with tea, put it on a tray, and carried it into the garden. This aroused his curiosity, and not getting very satisfactory replies to his questions, he followed the old woman. At first he could not understand what he saw, for she was sitting on the ground, apparently talking to a bank. But he soon found out all about it. The woman was talking to her afflicted daughter, who was lying in a hole in the bank like one of those cavities in the catacombs, where corpses were placed. The poor girl was so afraid of her parents becoming infected with her leprosy, that she dug this hole the length of her body in the bank, spread a piece of matting to lie on, and was waiting there till death should relieve her of her misery, and her parents the burden of her existence."

Ainus Brought to Christ.

Gospel Progress Among the Remote Tribes of North Japan—Queer Social Customs.

IN a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Sapporo, North Japan, Rev. J. Batchelor, a Protestant missionary now conducting Gospel work there, gives some interesting facts concerning the work in that field, and also relative to the peculiar social customs of the Ainu. He writes:

"As regards mission work, the war has not affected it in the least. The end of last year found us with a church membership of 219 persons, and 151 preparing for baptism. These are somewhat scattered, living in ten villages. The year closes with 407 baptized Christians, and ninety preparing for that rite. This gives an increase of 188 persons (without counting five who have died) in 17 villages. Our Ainu 'Hospital Rest' here at Sapporo has proved to be of very great service to us in the Master's work. During the summer months there were sometimes as many as thirty persons in it at one time, so that we have had splendid opportunities of preaching and teaching the Word close to our very doors.

I have just been called

A REST IN THE CAVERN.

IN THE GALLERIES OF THE GREAT CAVE.

upon to marry two Ainu Christians. The man is with us being trained as a catechist, and the young woman is a Christian of some eighteen months' standing, and about twenty-one years of age. She was committed to my care by her mother (her father having died long ago), who requested me to provide her with a husband! However, as I was not quick enough in producing this article for her, she looked out one for herself, and walked a distance of seventy miles in winter for the purpose of marrying him. This young lady has a sister who married another Christian some three months ago. It may seem strange in European eyes that this young lady should have done the courting, but it is not strange in this part of the world at all. Jacob served his uncle for years in order to be given his cousin in marriage, but in this part of the globe women have been known to serve for husbands. Speaking of the Kamtchatdales, Dobell wrote: 'Should a young man fall in love with a girl, and he is not rich enough to obtain her by any other means, he immediately enslaves himself to her father as a servant for three, four, or five, or ten years, according to agreement, before he is permitted to marry her. When the term agreed on expires, he is then allowed to live with the father-in-law as if he were his own son.' This well known custom seems to be universal in the East and is, I believe, known to every Asiatic nation.

"When this woman in question was being married she utterly refused to follow me in that part of the service where it says: 'I (n) take thee (m), to be my wedded husband,' etc., and had I been less acquainted with the Ainu manners, customs, and superstitions, I should have been obliged to send the pair off without performing the ceremony. As it was, by patience and a sharp word of reproof from myself and some members of the congregation, all went well.

"In my intercourse with the Ainu people I have frequently had occasion to ask the woman the name of her husband, and I have found when asked, they invariably blushed, and instead of answering themselves, called upon some friend present to do so. This struck me as being somewhat curious and I, at first, thought it was merely a form of shyness on their part. I had no idea that by asking the women to tell their husband's name I was tempting them to a breach of a jealously-guarded piece of etiquette, and asking them to trample on one of their deeply rooted superstitions. I know now, however, that it is considered to be a very unlucky and disrespectful thing in a woman to mention the name of her spouse. To do so will, it is supposed, bring misfortune to the family. There are, therefore, some more or less indirect and circuitous ways by which the women speak of their lords. Thus 'Ku goro goro, my person.' 'Ku goro ainu, my man.' 'En rorogeta an goro, my person at the upper end of the hearth.' 'En hekoti guru, the person who binds me.'

"The term in most common use among the women is, 'my man,' and that used by others when speaking to a woman about her husband is, 'your man.' The men indeed, may constantly be heard addressing their wives or speaking of them to others by name, though it is considered incorrect to do so. But during all the years I have been among the Ainu, I have but twice heard a man speak of his spouse by the term 'machi, i.e., wife.' It is considered unlucky to do so, and that designation is therefore carefully avoided. If a man desires to be very affectionate and nice to his wife, he will call her his 'katkimat the door of the heart,' but when speaking of her to another he calls her 'ku goro shiwende guru,' or 'ku goro shiwentep,' my person who is slow of foot:—or 'en usarageta an guru, my person at the lower side of the hearth.' It must not be supposed that when a woman speaks of her husband as 'my person at the upper end of the hearth,' or the husband of his wife as 'my person at the lower end of the hearth,' there is any sentiment intended. A widow will speak of her departed husband as her 'shupake, i.e., 'head of the floor,' and the husband of his deceased wife as his 'shonep or eshonep' i.e., 'floor,' or 'person of the floor.'"

The Beautiful Miss Blarcom.

THE "Blarcom girls," as they had been called in Hinckley for forty years, had each a special characteristic. One was "The talented Miss Blarcom." She wrote poetry and painted pictures, and the townspeople were very proud of her fame, prouder than she was herself of the one book, "A Wreath of Roses," which bore her name on its cover. Another sister was "The amiable Miss Blarcom." She was splendid at fairs and festivals, and from her early childhood had possessed the rare and sweet distinction of settling the village quarrels, she being of that race, of whom our Lord said, "Blessed are the peace-makers." The third was "The practical Miss Blarcom." If it hadn't been for her I do not know how the Blarcom sisters would have managed to live as nicely as they did on the little income their father left them, such a small provision against the inroads of poverty. But Eugenia Blarcom knew better than most women how to make both ends of a narrow income meet. She took a lodger now and then; when artists came to sketch the fine points in the neighborhood, or lecturers to entertain the people of the place, or the teachers at the Academy needed a home outside of the school limits, all these could obtain comfortable quarters and be looked after carefully, by going to the Blarcoms' and putting themselves under the wing of Miss Eugenia.

But Adele had the prettiest adjective of all tacked to her name. Far and near this dear lady was known as the "Beautiful Miss Blarcom."

She was no longer young, that is her girlhood was well past, and she had kept her thirty-ninth birthday. When she was eighteen, she had met with an accident which had hurt her back, and from that time on Adele Blarcom had been an invalid, spending many quiet hours on her lounge, never able to walk beyond the garden, seldom strong enough to go for anything beyond a short drive, and often a great sufferer.

One would have supposed that the conditions of her existence might easily have robbed Adele of her loveliness of face, of the fine bloom on her cheek, the soft smoothness of her forehead, the starry lustre of her eyes, the firm serenity of her mouth. Not so. As the slow years passed, and she still sat in the Master's own class, in his great school of suffering disciples, she grew constantly not only more attractive in disposition, but always lovelier and more captivating in her appearance.

Doctor Frazier had a new patient in his sanatorium. She was a Miss Reed, from a large Western town, a woman of fortune, who had had the world at her feet, and in having the world "too much with her, late and soon," had verified the poet's assertion. Living and spending had "laid waste her powers," and nervous prostration was the result. It was a stubborn case. Miss Reed defied Dr. Frazier's skill. She baffled him, and no matter what tactics he employed, she simply lay back in her easy chair, unable to lift a finger, and quite without the smallest interest in life.

The Doctor was talking about her to his wife, who, being a doctor, too, and a sensitive, up-to-date sort of woman as well, was her husband's best assistant.

"I'll tell you what we'll do," said Mrs. Frazier, or Doctor Polly, as she liked to be called. "We'll invite the beautiful Miss Blarcom here to make us a visit, and she shall help us cure Miss Reed."

"How can that be?" asked the Doctor, doubtfully, pulling the long ends of his gray moustache.

"Oh, I'll talk it over with Eugenia, and make it worth her while to lend us Adele. I'll offer a fee for the privilege of having Adele under our roof for a fortnight."

"Well," said Dr. Frazier, with a little shrug of his shoulders, as who should say, "I shake off this burden and leave the responsibility with you, my love." "Well, my darling, if anybody can manage the affair you can, only I don't want either of the ladies, Miss Reed or Miss Blarcom, to suspect the reason for our bringing them together."

"I wish," said Mrs. Polly, with much dignity, "that you did not always find it necessary, Jack, to treat me as if I was a child. I hate to be cautioned against telling this or that, and advised in matters concerning which I know as much as you do, more in fact, since you are only a big, blundering old fellow, as good as gold, but only a man, after all."

"I beg your pardon, wife," said the Doctor, very humbly, stooping to kiss his small partner in business, and pinching her cheek playfully. "You have a sharp little tongue of your own, Polly, but you have a sound heart, and much good sense, and I never lay it up against you when you scold me."

"You shouldn't Jack, for you are never scolded, except when you deserve to be," retorted Mrs. Polly, who always liked to have the last word.

Mrs. Frazier succeeded in her mission, convincing the sisters that a change would do Miss Adele good, and so, before the week was over, she was transferred to a sunny south-western room in the Sanatorium, with flowers in the windows, a canary in its cage, and a big gray cat which never glanced at the bird basking most of the time on the soft rug before the open fire. No "fee" had been so much as offered, but the practical sister took the opportunity of Adele's absence, to thoroughly clean her room at home, and to newly paper the walls.

Miss Reed was lying back as usual, listless and vacant, in her chair, when there came a soft tap at her door, and in walked the beautiful Miss Blarcom. She had a cluster of lilies in her hand, and she resembled a lily herself, tall, white, graceful, and carrying about a subtle sense of fragrance, the faintest ghost of a sweet perfume.

"May I give you these flowers?" she said, "they match your lace and your soft crepe shawl, and when I left my own chamber, I had to bring them with me, for they've been my best friends so long. It's such a happy thing, isn't it, to be alive, and to bloom?"

The words were not much, but the tone, and the smile, went to Miss Reed's heart. "I don't find it so very nice," she said.

"I think it's dull. I haven't seen anything new in two whole years, and I've been around the globe."

"You have, dear? How fine! I've not been so far from home, as I am this morning in ten years, and I live only a mile away."

The two gradually fell into talk, bit by bit. One day, for their talk was at first only for five minutes, then another time for a half hour, then for a morning, Miss Reed said:

"Won't you please tell me how you managed to keep the wrinkles away from your face, and to remain so pretty, when you've had so much pain? The corners of your mouth don't droop, and there is no frown between your eyes, and you haven't any crows'-feet to speak of."

"I've had a soft cushion under my head always," said Adele, gravely.

"A soft cushion?"

"Yes, dear Miss Reed, the blessed will of God. Day after day I've said to myself, God knows, God cares, God loves, I am his dear child. The will of God has been to me a cushion, and the peace of God has been to me a balm. I have simply taken my life a minute at a time. God always gives me strength for one minute. Every one of my days is a gift from him, and if he sends me pain and weakness, I do not mind, for his face is my light in the darkness, and his arms are under me, and I hear him whisper, 'Lean on me, dear child, lean hard, child of my love.'"

"And that is why you are the beautiful Miss Blarcom," said Miss Reed. "I too will claim a child's right, and lean on my Lord, and accept his will."

Zulu Witch-Finders.

The Strange Process of "Smelling Out" a Wizard Described by a Native Missionary.

A ZULU WITCH-DOCTOR.

HERE are strange customs still prevailing among the Zulus, who, notwithstanding the progress the Gospel has made in their country, still cling to many of the old heathen practices and superstitions. Missionary John L. Dube, of the Mapumlo Mission Station, Natal, South Africa, in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, interestingly describes some of these peculiar usages. He writes:

Among the many savage customs which prevail among the Zulu people is that of "smelling out" a wizard. The Kraal of a "witch-doctor" is always crowded with people who come there for the purpose of finding out from him the person who has brought sickness into their homes. The Zulus believe that if a man is sick, or dies, he has been bewitched. They always consult the "doctor" in regard to this matter. It does not make any difference whether the man was bitten by a snake or not, they claim that even then, someone must have used medicine to cause such bad luck.

Approaching the hut in which this "spirit-doctor" lives, you are impressed by its appearance, for it is unlike the ordinary huts. Just above the door, which is only two feet high, you see the skulls of many different kinds of snakes, lizards and birds. These are believed to have the power of bringing together the departed spirits of those animals to help the "doctor" in finding out mysteries. These skulls are hung by a string, fastened to a lightning rod, which is a stick stuck through the grass used for covering huts. This lightning-rod is reddened with a mixture of different charms, such as are supposed to have the power of preventing lightning from striking the hut. The low door is the only opening. There is neither window nor chimney. At the side of the door is a clay dish, full of some kind of herbs, thoroughly pounded and mixed in water, from which the ancestral spirits of the "doctor" drink, and thus receive strength to help the "doctor" in finding out all mystery connected with his business.

Creeping into the hut on your hands and knees, you see the old "doctor" sitting at the farthest point from the door. In the centre of the hut is a fire-place, over which there hangs from the roof charms that are believed to have the power of keeping other "doctors" from doing harm. Just near the door you find an "isicamelo," an item which you cannot pronounce, and which is a combination of pillow and chair, upon which everyone sits who comes to see the "doctor." Would you prefer a mat to sit on? This is also handy. The "doctor," who is as often a woman as a man, is usually dressed in a fantastic manner, always in the furs of some animal, such as the leopard or hyena. This dress is ornamented with skins of the iguana, bat, and snake. Her necklace is made of the horns and hoofs of small animals, and these have the value of prolonging her life. Her hair is twisted and braided, and smeared with black matter like a mixture of charcoal and fat. Her arms are painted with both black and red clay. To her head are hung, with a string, all sorts of feathers and charms that make her look very savage.

After the visitor has been seated in the "isicamelo," he addresses the "doctor" after this manner: "I have come concerning your business, Oh! mighty doctor."

"Well, my friend; I knew you were coming before ever you arrived."

"It is true, doctor; no one having magic power like yourself would be ignorant of persons coming to her on such important matters."

"The 'doctor' then goes out-doors, and leaves this man inside, and calls her boy and orders him to summon the ancestral spirits and to rattle the bones and charms that they may hear and be willing that such a trial should take place. After this, she goes inside and asks the man to clap his hands and to say, 'zizwe' ('we hear.'). Then the 'doctor' proceeds:

"You have come concerning a sick girl."

"Yes" (faintly), "I hear you doctor."

"No, I do not mean that; but I mean to say you have come about your father."

"Yes (stronger), I hear you, doctor."

"Clap your hands, that I may hear," says the doctor.

"I am clapping them."

"Do you not come here because your mother is sick?"

"Yes, yes (with emphasis), you are talking now."

Here the man becomes excited. He claps his hands just as much as he can and tells the doctor to smell out the trouble. When the doctor touches upon what the man suspects, the latter jumps and claps his hands. This way the doctor finds out what will come pretty nearly what the man suspects and what will please him. If any one is sent to consult the doctor who can, with calmness, keep saying, yes, I hear you, doctor, in all that she says, the doctor will send him home, saying, he does not know how to do it.

"Your mother has been bewitched by a wizard."

"Yes, yes, mighty doctor. Do tell us who that person is."

"The spirits are telling me that he is a tall man with a ring in head."

"Yes (faintly), I hear."

"No, it is a woman."

"Yes, yes; you were right there."

"She is a short woman."

"Yes, yes" (with emphasis).

The doctor will give all the peculiarities she can think of to the satisfaction of the man. After the "trial" is over, the man goes home and tells the people about the wizard who is using charms against them and the people go to their chief and report this case, for which the one suspected has to suffer a great deal. In the time of Chaka and Dingaan, and even Cetewayo such "wizards" suffered death.

May we not hope that Christian mission among the Zulus will be the means of stopping all these customs which tend to degrade people? Among some of the mission stations we have seen good examples of those who have given up all superstitions, and are living true Christian lives.

Mr. Dube labors in a section where mission work is greatly in need of means to enable its conductors to extend their operations. Already much good service has been done by the Mapumlo Mission among the natives, but the field is a vast one and the means at the disposal of the workers are very small in comparison.

Relief will be sent to Palu, if possible, through the missionaries at Harpoot, from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund.

All contributions to the Fund will be acknowledged in these columns. The contributions for last week are acknowledged on page 74 of this issue.

God's Chariots.

THAT story of Elijah and Elisha does not bother me. Mind you, Elisha was plowing with twelve yoke of oxen, and he with the twelfth, a statement that used to confound me, but I saw near Damascus, on the banks of the river Pharpar, fourteen yoke of oxen plowing. One plow in America would do the work of ten plows in Palestine. Elisha cried: "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof." He called Elijah a father by way of reverence, and then goes on to say, you are like a whole army of strength, you are like batteries and mounted troops; nothing could stand before you. You are the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof. Elisha rent his garments in twain as Elijah departed. That is the Oriental's way of expressing vehemence of emotion. An Oriental is fond of dramatic demonstration. What we express by facile vocabulary, he does by gesture, by ripped coat, by torn out handfuls of hair, by actions which to us would be ludicrous. If we saw a man stamping on his hat or taking off his coat and ripping it into pieces, we would tell him he had better save his clothes, and that such actions are more significant of dementia than of grief. But when Elisha, the Oriental, assailed his wardrobe, it was to those who looked on, a terrific paroxysm of emotion that made observers stand aghast. Notice the behavior of the sceptics on the occasion of Elijah's ascension. They asked, after the chariot of fire had sailed up the hills of heaven, that a scouting party of fifty go out and find the body of Elijah. The sceptics saw the prophet start in a chariot, but they were sure he would fall out of the aerial vehicle. They looked upon it as a sort of balloon ascension. They pestered Elisha until he consented to let fifty men go out in search of the body of the sky climber. They would probably find the poor remains in a tree top or on a crag, the eagles having left the carcass eyeless; or perhaps he might be still alive, and they would bring him into the encampment wounded and expiring, to say: "This is what became of your aeronautic adventure." But three days' search revealed no accident. The fact is, that when the Lord drives a man heavenward he does not upset him. Elijah started right and he arrived right. Alas for these sceptics who will not believe in anything supernatural. As long as the chariot of our religion rolls on the ground, they admit it, but as soon as it rolls out of sight they have no faith it will carry. So they go up and down the earth, not fifty of them, as in Bible times, but 10,000 of them, looking for dead Elijahs.

Fishers of Souls.

ARE we fishers of souls or fishers of men? A great deal is said in sermons and hymns about saving the soul; and yet very little is said about it in the New Testament. Nothing is said in the Gospels or in the writings of Paul about saving souls. Why have we taken up such a half-way idea? The Bible conceives of salvation as affecting the whole man. It is unscriptural to cast contempt on the body, to call it "vile," and to always speak of it as something of which we may well be rid. The apostle does not say the body is vile. He says it is "corruptible." The body is a "living sacrifice" to God. It is the "temple of the Holy Ghost." Let us fish for men, for whole men, for men with bodies and souls, for men with homes and families, and offices, and business cares, and temptations, and a thousand difficulties incident to this earthly life. Was not that the idea of Jesus, when he said: "I make you fishers of men?"

Concerning Suicide.

THERE is now another epidemic of suicide, two of its victims buried in one grave, one recently choosing a cemetery as the best place to enact the tragedy. In the various parts of the land, life dismissed by one's own decree; over fifty cases of suicide reported in one week. The announcement of such cases seems to suggest to others an easy way of getting out of the troubles of this life. Like scarlet fever and typhoid fever, suicide seems contagious. The practical question that all moralists ask is: Why this increase of self-destruction? The answer to me is plain. It is not because the poverty and troubles of the world are increasing. Never before was there so large a proportion of people with enough to eat and wear. Never before were there so many sympathies and helpful kindnesses for the distressed as now. The reason for the rapidly increasing cases of suicide is the growing belief that without respect to the mode of exit from this life all those who launch themselves from time into eternity arrive in happy condition and in a happy peace. They simply shoot themselves into paradise. They hang themselves into glory. They go by the way of "paris-green" into eternal felicity. Fatal error! The victims of their own deception.

The Cold a Mercy.

THE microbes are dead. This week's arctic blast has slain them. One of the best doctors in all the world is Jack Frost. From this time a new chapter in sanitary improvements is opened. Nothing can take the place of winter. Cold is as much a mercy from God as heat. The world has rung with applause for those who have discovered the microbes as the cause of disease, but the loudest applause must be reserved for those who will discover what will extirpate them. But, while that discovery hangs fire, a blast out of the north comes to the rescue. Meanwhile, let it be known that there has been no epidemic. Druggists and doctors are my authority for saying so.

The old-fashioned influenza must not be despoiled of its honors. That has been in the world ever since the antediluvians first coughed and sneezed. Pneumonia is as old as the world. Fevers do their hard work in summer, congestion of the lungs finds its harvest in winter. But it is very certain that the seasons are changing, and during the process of change the human race must suffer.

The world is yet to be a garden in full bloom, according to the only Book that speaks authoritatively of the future, and you cannot have much of a garden as long as the thermometer makes excursions to zero. The intense heat will go out of the summer and intense frigidities out of the winter, and the months of the year will move in procession graduated to the capacities and needs of the human race.

M. E. D., Paragould, Ark. What is meant by deceiving the elect? Matt. 24: 34.

That the pretenders would be so plausible and would so successfully imitate Christ for base purposes that Christian people might be deceived. Christ warned them to be on their guard and assured them that when he came a second time his glory would be such that his identity could not be doubted.

Constant Reader, Bainbridge, Pa. 1. How old was Benjamin when he accompanied his brothers to Egypt and why was he more favored than his brothers? 2. Is it prudent for a lady to accept the office of President of a Society of Christian Endeavor?

1. It cannot be known with certainty, but probably twenty-four or twenty-five years old. He was the son of Jacob's favorite wife, and Jacob thought him at the time her only surviving son. Joseph would naturally also make him his favorite as his only brother and love him better than his half-brothers who were hostile to him and jealous of him. 2. Why not? If the members of her society think she can serve them in that capacity she should be willing to do so. Sometimes a woman's tact gives her special qualifications for the duties of the office.

Anxious Inquirer, Warner, Ill. Do you advise the candidate for baptism to be sprinkled or immersed? Which is the mode enjoined in the New Testament?

If there was any mode enjoined in the New Testament, that would settle the whole question. No Christian would be guilty of disobedience even in the most trivial matter, if there was a clear direction. You should clearly understand that Christian ministers who use the mode of immersion and those who sprinkle are both perfectly conscientious in their conduct. We cannot give advice in the matter, except to say that if any person comes to the conclusion that it is his duty to go through the ceremony of immersion, he should do so. It becomes to him a matter of conscience, but he should be willing that other people should have the same liberty, and should not pass judgment upon them if they cannot see the same importance in the ceremony that he does.

G. H. G., Leeds, Va. Do Christ's words in Matt. 19: 28 and John 3: 13 imply that there is a physical change in the body at conversion and that obedience to the law is the way of salvation?

We see no basis in the words for any belief in a physical change. The new birth applies to the soul. The power given by the Holy Spirit enables a man to subordinate his physical appetites and passions to his higher nature and so a physical change ensues. The drunkard who was formerly the slave of his craving for liquor and who drank even while he knew it was detrimental to him, finds after conversion that there is a stronger power within him than there was before—a power capable of keeping the body in subjection. The passage in Matthew simply reminded the questioner of his own creed. It pointed him also in the next verses to a higher plane in which mere negative goodness becomes active. The man though professing to be blameless was dissatisfied with himself and Christ tells him how he can attain a higher life.

C. W. P., Christiana, Tenn. 1. Was not the burning of incense a regular custom of old Zacharias? 2. What was the star seen by the wise men? 3. Was John the Baptist the first to introduce baptism or was there such a rite before him? 4. Was the rejected stone altogether figurative or had it a literal fulfillment?

1. Zacharias was not high priest, he was a member of one of the twenty-five courses who divided the temple duties for the year. As this particular duty was apportioned by lot, it might apparently fall to him in any year. This was not the great function of the day of atonement which was performed by the High Priest as prescribed by law and was not subject to the lot. 2. It is generally believed that it was a meteor. There was an important conjunction of planets which would be a brilliant spectacle about that time but the fact of the wise men seeing it go before them and appearing over the inn would imply that it was a meteor. 3. The washing by water as typical of purification was known before John (see Lev. 8: 6) as was also the type of sprinkling (see Ezek. 36: 25) but John appears to have been the first to use it as an initiatory rite. 4. We do not know of any instance of a literal fulfillment but there may have been. It is not important.

Inquirer, Truro, N. S. 1. Is it right to say that conversion is the only proof of regeneration, faith feeling, etc.? 2. Is it right to declare the number of conversions in a revival when the President of the Society teaches that only those who have faith truly are truly converted? 3. Is it possible to bring up children so that they do not know the time of their conversion?

1. Conduct is not the only proof; but it is the most conspicuous to other people. James gives the philosophy of it and claims that if a man has not works there is good reason for doubting his faith. The man himself may be sure by his feelings that the change has been worked in him, but his friends and associates must inevitably form their judgment of him by his conduct. 2. The Evangelist is sometimes rash in pronouncing on the subject. At best he can only know that a profession of faith is made, which he hopes will prove to be true conversion. 3. Yes, the change may be gradual and the better the child is trained the more likely it is to be so. But even with such cases the child is generally conscious of a difference in his life which shows him that at some past time he passed the boundary line into the kingdom.

E. H. Miller, Tupelo, Miss. Is there not a contradiction between the petition, "Lead us not into temptation," and the statement of James that God does not tempt any man?

The petition is more correctly translated, "Abandon us not in temptation." There is no contradiction even as the phrase stands, as God may place us in circumstances where temptations assail us and may do so for the strengthening and discipline of character without directly tempting us. Matthew says (4: 1), Jesus was led of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil.

Subscriber, N.Y. A young man who has just reached his majority, and will therefore vote at the next presidential election, wishes to be informed on the political situation of our country, so that he may be able to vote intelligently. What newspaper or newspapers would you advise him to take?

As almost all newspapers have their own political bias, and almost without exception have strong party attachments, they are not safe guides to a fair and impartial understanding of the nation's political affairs. In "The Hand Book of American Politics" (published as part of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Library premium), all the leading political questions that enter into our nation's life, past and present are fairly set forth, and you will find it serviceable for your purpose.

Baptist, Fredericksburg, Va. There is among us a feeling of deep sympathy for the Armenians, but little money is going to them because churches are apathetic. If they could be roused to action the people would follow their lead and much good could be done.

We know of no better Christian work than churches could undertake than this of helping the destitute Christian people of Armenia. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now sending weekly remittances to a number of relief stations in Armenia through the American Board missionaries. All the churches should be represented in this humane work.

Charles G. S., Hudson, N. C. Why is it that the number seven is regarded as a perfect number?

According to the ancient symbolists the numbers 3 and 4, represented, the first, Divinity in its triune form; the second, Humanity the whole, equaling 7, being typical of the union between God and man. From the more remote times the number 7 has been regarded as the symbol of perfection by Hebrews, Greeks, Romans, Chinese, Egyptians, Arabs and Persians. It was held as representing the septennate of days occupied in the complete creation, and being therefore a period of time rendered sacred by Deity itself. The sacred character the Jews recognized in ranging their fasts and feasts and other ceremonies. For these and other reasons the number 7 came to be accepted as a cyclical number indicative of perfection or completeness.

Havana Threatened.

REPORTS of insurgent successes come from Cuba and obtain credence in spite of the contradictions emanating from Spanish sources. A steamer which arrived from Havana on January 15 reported that a small patriot army of only fifteen miles from the city when the vessel left port. Whether an attack on the capital was meditated, was not certain, but the city officials believed that the enemy was coming there. The insurgents are pursuing their usual tactics of avoiding a decisive battle and were contenting themselves with harassing the Spanish forces and drawing them into ambushes. Gen. Martinez Campos has formed a plan for surrounding the patriot army and compelling a general engagement. It was, however, thought probable that Gomez and Maceo, the insurgent leaders, would lure the Spanish trap and succeed in reaching Havana. Great alarm was felt in the city, as it is crowded with Spanish refugees from all parts of the island, who would be likely to do some desperate fighting, before allowing the capital to fall into the hands of the insurgents. At the Cuban legation in Washington, it was stated that during the seven months since the insurrection broke out, the patriot army had occupied every province in the island. Several important towns have fallen into its hands, without firing a shot. The plan adopted, is to notify the authorities that if resistance is offered, the city will be burned and the residents, concerned for the safety of their property, usually succeed in inducing the commandant to surrender to the insurgents without fighting. The Spaniards say, however, that Havana will not fall in that way, and that a determined and resolute defence will be made. An American newspaper correspondent says that the insurgents have now twenty-five thousand men under arms and could have more, if they had rifles to put in their hands. Neither are these exclusively of the lower classes. On the staffs of Gomez and Maceo were many prominent planters and professional men. He adds that throughout the island there is strong sympathy with the insurgent cause and an earnest hope that it will succeed. There is no prospect of the success of any negotiation for peace, except on the basis of complete autonomy. The people feel that they were defrauded in 1878 when, after a struggle lasting nearly ten years, they laid down their arms, relying on Spanish promises of reform. The promises, they aver, were not kept and they will not be trusted this time. The correspondent declares his conviction that Spain will have to withdraw from Cuba altogether, or reconquer it and hold it by force. As Martinez Campos was the agent who in 1878 pacified Cuba with promises, none will know better than he why the insurgents persist in fighting. He is in a position to realize the truth of the wise king's warning that

It is an abomination to kings to commit wickedness for the throne is established by righteousness (Prov. 16:12.)

A Missing Heir.

An estate said to be worth nearly a quarter of a million dollars is in the hands of a New York lawyer, pending the discovery of the rightful owner. He is the son of a man named Colt, and if he is living, is about seventy-two years of age. His father died seventy years ago, and his mother married a man named Plomer.

The lad took the name of his step-father, which accounts for his identity with the Colt family being overlooked. He served through the civil war with an honorable record, and at its close returned to New York, finally settling in Brooklyn. After an unsatisfactory matrimonial experience, he went to live with his mother in the Williamsburgh district, where he used to get a meagre living by peddling fish. Very few people knew him intimately, and no one now seems to remember when he disappeared. The last time some can remember seeing him, was at his mother's funeral, some twelve years ago. Where he went afterward, no one appears to know. It was discovered recently that he was the heir-at-law to a member of the Colt family, and advertisements are appearing asking him to disclose himself, and offering a reward for any intelligence of him. As he was in needy circumstances, the lawyer has little doubt of him presenting himself soon, if he is still alive. When he knows of a home as she has been accustomed to, but that is the necessary consequence of marrying a poor man. If she really loves her husband, the pleasure of his society will more than compensate her for the luxuries she has given up. It is so with the Christian when he gives himself to Christ. The joys of union with him are greater than the worldly pleasures he renounces, but those joys are never realized by any until, like the bride in this instance, they are ready to deny themselves and take up their cross.

Whosoever forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple. Luke 14:33.

A New Photographic Light.

A scientific journal reports an important discovery from the University of Wurtzburg, in Austria. It states that Prof. Routgen in making some photographic experiments needed a light of greater penetrating power than ordinary sunlight. After several attempts to produce such a light, he decided to use what is technically called a "Crooke's Pipe" through which an induction current was run. By the rays emitted from the pipe the photographs were taken from ordinary plates. But to the professor's surprise he found that the light so used had a penetrating power he had not suspected. Many opaque substances became transparent under it, to the lens of the camera. Thus it was possible to photograph articles covered with a cloth and, appeared that a dispossess order had already been issued but the policeman who went to serve it was so distressed by the widow's condition that he put the order in his pocket and went away to buy her some coal and provisions. The owner of the house, however, proved his case and the judge said he had no alternative but to give judgment as requested. The order was that the defendant pay the nine dollars and costs and give up possession of the room. "Now," said the judge, when his decision had been recorded, "I shall pay that judgment myself." He paid the plaintiff and the court fees and told the landlord he should expect him to let the woman keep her room. Thus the law was satisfied by the judgment and the poor woman was saved by the personal kindness of the judge. When people say they can see no need of Christ dying for the salvation of sinners they forget that the principle of the atonement is recognized as right and necessary in the affairs of life.

That he might be just and the justifier of him who believeth. Rom. 3:26.

BRIEF NOTES.

As Our Arrangements with the Owners of the copyright will shortly expire, we are about to close out our stock of Dr. Talmage's great book "From Manger to Throne" and his work entitled "The Pathway of Life." We will extend any subscription from the present date of expiry for one year, and send both of these books beautifully bound in cloth, and together weighing six pounds, all charges prepaid, on receipt of $2. As the regular subscription price of each of these books was $3.75, the two combined represented a value of over $7.50. As many of our subscribers already have these books in their library, we should be glad to have them extend this offer to all of their friends, and as far as the supply will last, we will endeavor to accommodate them.

Statistics of the Membership of the various denominations in the United States compiled and published by the Independent, show that the net gains in communicants since 1890 are more than three and a half millions, and that church membership is increasing faster than the population. More than ten new churches are formed every day.

Miss Frances E. Willard desires her friends everywhere to understand that she is in no way responsible for the so-called Woman's Bible and that she has had no connection whatever with it.

The Japanese Buddhists are not too proud to take a lesson from Christian methods. Recent letters from Japan state that they have started Young People's Societies of Buddhist Endeavor, Young Men's Buddhist Associations, etc.

St. Bartholomew's Church New York has received another handsome gift from Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt. It is a property on Forty-second Street for which Mr. Vanderbilt recently paid sixty thousand dollars.

It is to be used as a site for a building devoted to missionary and charitable work.

Special Revival Services are being held every evening except Saturday through this month at Hanson Place M. E. Church, Brooklyn. Dr. Louis Albert Banks, the pastor, conducts the services and is assisted by ministerial brethren in turn.

The English Missionary Societies report the receipt of large contributions in response to their appeal. The London Missionary Society has received $425,000.

Rev. Geo. C. Needham is laboring in Lowell, Mass., this month holding union meetings in which several pastors and churches are participating. He expects to arrange for several Bible Conferences.

Dr. Mary F. Eddy of Beirut, Syria, whose letter to this journal we published last week, writes that all the chief points in Syria are now occupied by strong garrisons of Turkish troops, and in many places the inhabitants are in great terror not knowing what fresh outrages this may portend. Travel is now impossible in many districts as the Turks seize every animal they can lay hands on to carry their ammunition and supplies.

The New York City Christian Endeavor Union numbers 135 societies, with a membership of 6,500, and the Chicago Union has now increased to 410 societies, with a membership of about 18,000. German, Dutch, Norwegian, Swedish, Welsh, Bohemian and Chinese are languages in which meetings are regularly held in societies belonging to the Chicago Union. New York also has Bohemian, Italian, French and German societies.

The Foreign Mission Board of the Dutch Reformed Church makes a gratifying report. During the eight months from May 1st to December 31st, 1895, the total receipts for work, general and special, beside those for the debt, were $53,553.31, a gain of $5,313.81 over the corresponding period of 1894. That such an increase should occur at the same time that the churches are making an earnest effort to relieve the Board of its debt is most encouraging.

The Independent publishes a story of the building of a church which may be useful in other places. It appears that a congregation at Middletown, Iowa, decided to have a new church building and one on which there should be no debt. They agreed to have the proposed estimated cost apportioned to the individual members of the church, according to the amount of their property as shown by the assessor's book. This was done; and each member paid his proportion cordially and promptly, with the result that when the building was dedicated recently, there was not a cent of debt upon it.

that the estate is waiting him, he is likely to lose no time in claiming it. He will not act as too many do who sit indifferent while Christian ministers tell them of an eternal inheritance purchased for them by Christ, which they may have freely.

A Bride's Alternative.

A family trouble has come to light in South Amboy, N. J. The daughter of a wealthy citizen became engaged to a young man of Perth Amboy. Her parents, however, refused their consent to the match, as the suitor was comparatively poor, and was beneath them in social position. The young couple, fearing that steps might be taken to separate them permanently, determined on getting married without the consent of the girl's parents. They availed themselves of the first opportunity, and were secretly married, the bride going after the ceremony to her home, and the bridegroom to his place of business. The parents knew nothing of the matter for a month, but at the end of that time some friend of the family heard of it and told the father. When the girl learned that her father knew of her undutiful conduct, she prepared for a stormy interview. But to her surprise, she was not scolded. Her father quietly told her that he would never recognize her husband as his son-in-law. She might take her choice between giving up her home, or giving up her husband; she could not have both. The bride was a good deal distressed, but decided finally to be true to her husband, and she quitted her girlhood's home to cast in her lot with her husband. She will not have so luxmore wonderful still, the human flesh, also became transparent, so that it was possible to photograph the bones in the hand of a living person held before the camera. To the unassisted eye the flash of the light gave no added power, but in the photograph the flesh had presented no greater obstacle than if it had been glass. Already the light has been turned to practical account by the professor in the hospital in photographing a broken bone and in tracing the course of a bullet in a patient's arm. If this report is true, the professor has made one of the most wonderful discoveries of the age and one that will be of immense service to science. It should teach sceptics who are disposed to ridicule the doctrine of God's omniscience that there is no ground for incredulity. If within the reach of man there is a power that will make flesh transparent to the camera, it is not too much to believe that the Creator possesses the power ascribed to him of reading the heart.

All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do. (Heb. 4:13.)

Paid his Own Award.

A pathetic case was tried in a local court a few days ago. It was the suit of the owner of a house against one of his tenants, a widow whose rent was nine dollars in arrear. The widow was unable to be present, and the judge was informed that she was dying of consumption. A kindly person who had been helping her, added the information that her only support was the earnings of her seven-year old son who sold papers on the streets, and a plea on her behalf was made that she should be dealt with leniently. It ap-

FATHER did not know but you might need a lawyer's services in settling—" began Levina Skeele. "No, I thank you," said Janet abruptly, and proceeded to close the door. Then she opened it as if to ask the caller in, but Miss Skeele was as quick in going as Janet had been prompt in signifying that she had better go. The sharp, turned-up nose was seeking the sky in the direction of the street, and Miss Lavina Skeele shooting off in a pet.

"That is the way the proud miss takes offers of a lawyer's help. What does she know about business?" Miss Lavina was snappishly saying to herself. "I suppose she thinks she can do without my father."

The Morton family in its various branches had had altogether too much to do with Lawyer Skeele. How damaging had been his work, Janet did not know. She had had suspicions, and often wished she had knowledge. Janet did not feel satisfied with her disposition of her caller, though she had reason to dislike Lavina's cool, abrupt tender of her father's business services at an hour when her soul was torn so grievously by sorrow, and did not need an attorney, but another mother, or some one who would say: "I am so sorry for you, and I want to sympathize with you, and in some way help you if I can. Can't I carry your burden with you, or can't I sit down with you and keep you company in the shadow of this great grief?" Though Lavina's method was the very opposite of this spirit, and the lawyer's motive was only a selfish desire to anticipate any employment of his rival, Squire Manning, Janet was sorry she had not asked Lavina in, for there was the rain dripping. It took a great effort to say it, but she made the effort and said it, as the caller walked away, "Won't you come in?" Miss Lavina did not lower her nose or turn her head or make any halt, but gave the answer Janet had given her, saying sharply, sneeringly also, "No, I thank you."

Janet went back into a house that seemed emptier, more silent than ever. She took with her a load that was more crushing. To think all the sympathy the outside world had for her was a tender of professional services by one who wanted to make all the money he could out of her, and make it as promptly as possible! But there was the door-bell again. This time it was a lighter ring, and the notes were broken as if a child's weak and uncertain grasp had been laid upon the bell-knob, and there at the low window, what was it that Janet saw but a round, little face peering in? The child having rung, wanted to see what the effect of the ringing might be.

"Why, Ethel?" exclaimed Janet, gladly opening the door, admitting a chubby little girl of marked beauty. Her eyes were full and black, and her skin was as fair as her eyes were dark. The wind had fanned into a bright, coal-like glow the rounded cheeks. Her pretty lips were breathing like a rose-bud when it is parting into a blossom, and she laughed as she exclaimed, "Pleeeen told me to stay with you till Miss Blakey Chase comes to-night, and she'll fetch me home. There! Aint you glad?"

"Paulina is real good, and here she is."

Yes, Paulina was bustling up the path leading from the street gate. "I just sent her ahead, you know. Wanted to see what she would do if she pulled the bell herself, and wasn't she 'cute? I knew she would do you good, and told mother to let her stay with you till Blakey's wife comes and she'll fetch her home. Poor creetur! How do you feel now?"

Paulina was considerate enough to answer all the questions she asked, and on too hard. Try to make the best of it. That is a good girl."

"Won't you come in?" asked Janet. "Oh, my! Bless me, no! Madame wouldn't know where I am. Now, Janet!"

Here Paulina lowered her voice as if about to say something confidential.

"Now, Janet, you'll come up to see Madame, I know. Let by-gones be by-gones. I am down here expressly because Madame wanted me to come, while I wanted bad enough to come myself, but sick as she is, bless you, I couldn't have got away if she hadn't let me. Massy, how the wind blows! And he right most here, too! But as I was about to say, I am here as a kind of olive branch stretched out from Madame to his family here, and—"

Paulina checked her fast-going speech. She suddenly thought, "How little is left of his family! Only Janet!"

She paused a moment and then went on in a pitying tone, "Now, that's a-dear! You meet Madame half-way. You know she hasn't chick nor child—"

"John, there is John."

"John! Cut off without a cent. You know how he carried on and—"

"Yes, but he was generous-hearted."

"Yes, and I always stood up for him. I say more than once to the old folks, 'John's a colt, you wait. He—he'll git broken in and you wait.' Oh, it was a pity when his father cut him off! But I hear he's a-doin' well at the war. They say there's no braver one than John. Oh, my! Would'n't I like to know where his child is! They say after his wife's death, he put the little creetur into a home and when he wanted to take the child out, he couldn't find her. They had given her away. Had a right to, of course, for that was in the stipulation, if John didn't come for her, and he didn't. Now I hear it worries him—"

"Was he wounded at Fredericksburg?" "I believe so, but they say he's better now. Massy! How I am a-running on! I must be a-goin'. Now hold up! Don't git cast down—more than you can help."

Off trotted Paulina in the direction of the big house where lived Madame Morton, Janet's only aunt. Her uncle was dead. John, the only son, was an officer in the war between the North and the South. Janet liked John. There was a secret cord of sympathy fastening them together. Janet's father and John's father were brothers, and on anything but brotherly terms. Judson Skeele Morton, Janet's father, always claimed that he had been sorely wronged by Nathan, his brother. The two went by one another on the street as unconscious of each other's presence, seemingly, as two icebergs meeting and passing in a Northern sea. John had been disinherited by his father.

"I have no money for prodigals," said Nathan Morton. The same sharp hand cut off his brother's family, in the making of his will two years before he died. After his death, no codicil to the will was found making any change in behalf of his brother Judson. Janet who was passed over, for this very reason felt a sympathetic interest in the rejected heir. About the time of the death of Janet's mother, Madame Morton for a long time an invalid, was much sicker. Through Paulina, hints were conveyed to Janet that her aunt would like to see her. When the funeral occurred, Paulina had been specially urged by Madame to be present and had been also ordered to go that she might represent her mistress. Who else could represent the family? John was off at the war. An only sister was dead. There had never been but these two children in the family. Paulina came therefore to the funeral, both as a delegate and as "an olive branch." Having discharged all her duties, she was now on her way to the shadowy mansion whose front windows at night would show but a single light. That was Madame Morton's sick-chamber. It was the shining of one star in the wall of a dark cloud. Would Janet's home to-night, at lighting-time, show any more extended illumination? Oh, the loneliness of the house where two have lived side by side, and then death enters and leads one away blindfolded and hushed and moving with noiseless step! How silent and empty now are the rooms, when only one sits down to the cheerless meal, only one rises to drag through the light tasks that have become heavy as mill-stones, only one in all the house when night and silence descend on all the land! But into the emptiness of Janet's life, into its awful hush that every sound seemed not to break up but emphasize, came a child, came the music of its prattle, came the warmth of its sympathy. It was life entering to triumph over death.

"I love you," she said, and throwing her arms about Janet's neck, held up her rosebud mouth that it might be kissed.

"Dear little thing! You, like me, have no father and mother," thought Janet, passionately kissing the child. Yes, Ethel had no known father and mother. She was a waif picked up at a sea-port town by Skipper Jerry Davis, the father of Jed and Paulina. Skipper Jerry, with one glass eye and one wooden leg, but proud of the glass and wood, because he got them under Admiral Farragut going up the Mississippi. If Ethel had been actually the child of the skipper, she could not have been more tenderly loved in the Davis home. Janet always had welcomed her, and the child now crept into a deeper nook in Janet's affections.

"Now you want me to sing for you, don't you?" said Ethel, patting Janet's cheeks.

"Oh, yes! please sing for me." Ethel sang several nursery compositions. Then with a quick transition of style, her large eyes were fastened like stars on Janet's serious face. "Don't you want me to sing, 'I heard the voice?'"

"Oh, yes!" If somewhere out of the storm had come a cherub, and bringing its sweet notes, had begun to sing, it did not seem to Janet as if it could have touched her more deeply. This was the sentiment breathed through the sweet strains:

I heard the voice of Jesus say,
"Come unto me and rest!"
Lay down, thou weary one, lay down Thy head upon my breast."
I came to Jesus as I was—
Weary and worn and sad;
I found in him a resting-place,
And he has made me glad.

Janet was bowing her face and hiding her tears. Had death seemed to her like the maelstrom described in the opening words of this chapter, a vortex raging and absorbing the dearest hopes and possessions? Janet was not spiritually standing where she could see the real intent of death. It is not the maddened whirlpool, blindly driven, aimlessly urged, but a stream with definite flow, going out whither God would have it; running toward the dark of sunset because we cannot see the day that is beyond. It is not so much a death-stream, leaving behind a body it has wrecked, as a life-current bearing away that which is immortal and precious. Ah, Janet had not got so far as to see Him in her sainted mother's departure. To her it was not life taking away, and saving the soul, but death leaving behind the shattered body. It was a comfort, though, to hear Ethel sing, and as she sang, Janet seemed to see One standing by the dark stream, and his voice was full of inexpressible sympathy and comfort as he cried: "Come unto me and rest!"

"You sing it again, Ethel," she whispered.

And Ethel sang it again, and Janet's heart grew stiller. She hardly knew why the song quieted her. She was conscious next that Ethel was patting her cheeks with her soft little hands, telling her not to cry, that it would not rain all the time, and this bad, bad storm would go away.

"What's that?" Ethel suddenly asked. It was a noise at the rear door, an impatient knock that made itself heard in spite of the noise of the storm and the plashing of the rain-drops against the window, and the cry of the wind. And was that a form going by the window? It was so late now in the day that all things were fast draping themselves in deep shadow, and it was not easy to see outlines sharp and distinct. The knock at the door could be plainly heard, though.

"I must see who it is at the door," said Janet.

She opened the door, and at the same time let the light of a lamp, lighted on her way, fall out upon a group gathered around the doorstep. And were they carrying someone in their arms? The contentious talking arrested her attention even more than the sight of a figure drooping upon the broad chest of Jed Davis.

"I tell ye," said Jed, "I know she'll let him come, and it's the best place by all odds. Come on."

"You have got more zeal than discretion bringing him here," said a voice that Janet recognized as Lawyer Skeele's, and it was in a displeased tone.

"What does all this mean?" asked Janet.

"I told him," said Jed, nodding in the direction of the lawyer, "that you would let us. I know you. Lift on your end, Sandy. Stiddy, thar!"

Sandy Jones was holding up the leg of the man for whose head Jed's chest had become a pillow.

"Who is it?" asked Janet.

"A man from the wreck," replied Jed, pushing into the house. "Jest got him ashore. Come nigh leave'n him on the wreck! Stiddy, there, Sandy! Hold your end up well! Stiddy, Sandy, thar!"

The man from the wreck was carried in to that house from which a few hours before there had been a carrying out of life into death. This was like a bringing back out of death into life, and Janet eagerly answered, "By all means, Jed, bring him in!"

"There! I told ye so!" exclaimed Jed triumphantly.

Lawyer Skeele, muttering as if in anger and defeat, shrank back into the storm.

CHAPTER II.

One more on the Wreck.

The moment Jed's duties at the funeral were over, he said, "Now I am goin' down to the shore!"

He needed to take only a short walk, for Janet Morton's house was one of those in the village nearest the sandy borders of the sea. He halted one moment on a rocky crest overlooking the water. "Whew!" exclaimed Jed, "if this storm aint a buster!"

The sea, generally so blue, was one raging, frothing surface of white, save that on the slopes of the irregular, breaking and broken waves, were patches of green. In the midst of this angry, furious commotion was the dark hull of a vessel. He had often halted in this very place on pleasant days and watched the orderly, a most methodical advance of the breaker rising up in systematic succession out of the sea, first only a wrinkle, a fold in the water, heightening, expanding, swelling into a beautiful dark wall, its summit the curving, tipping, falling over, gracefull shivering in a descent of the whitest foam that swept down the shore and also swept up the shore, spreading out over the sand and hiding them under a carpet of snow as it for the coming of a gay throng of tender-footed nymphs out of the sea. That day there was no order in the advance the waves, no slow, stately growth, a leisurely, graceful dissolution, but it was the most sudden upspringing and then the most tumultuous collapse of breakers. Janet had often admired in a fair weather sea that even, regular progress in the soul of a billow changing into a breaker. That roar would begin at one end of the low wave that was toppling and tumbling, as it would go on—on—on, a long, steady boom—m—m—m, till there was a subbing into the heavy rustle of the foam rushing up the sands. "Like a long file soldiers firin' off their muskets," Janet would say as he watched the progress roar, and the long, smoke-like fold of foam sweeping on and on. He had never been in the great war, but the pictures which he had seen, had taken a strong hold upon his fancies, and the waves were columns of soldiers or lines of artillery. The movements and the noises were those of battle. Wave was crashing against wave, roar mingling with roar, in the most deniac tumult. If Jed loved to contemplate, and found occasion to admire a fair weather sea, the ocean to-day was awful. One scene would move a reverent witness of the far-reaching, stately, beautiful ocean, to say, "How great is God, how strong and wise," then the other display would lead, with slackened breath, hands folded, one to cry, "God be merciful! Save all souls at sea!"

Our Children.

LOOKED at the happy children who gathered around the hearth; if they were, no children could be happier on earth: their merry plays, and their winsome and the sound of their silvery mirth. [ways, I thought of those other children, sorrow, and hard, and bold, huddle in slum and cellar, and shiver with want and cold; fresh as the dew, or the morning's hue, and haggard, and lean, and old. Yet may they still—those children—taught to forget their pain; gathered in arms that loved them, their laughter may come again: the stare of woe and the craft may go, and the spirit be washed of stain. It is not in cold book-learning those children's hearts to move; at the stony eye of the serpent death to the stricken dove: an angel alone can touch them—that angel's name is Love.

An Arab Chief at Home.

Raschid, once the Vali of Stanley Falls, and his Wife—An Eventful Career.

AMONG the many men who, in recent years, have taken a prominent part in Central African history, few were better known than Tippoo Tib and his relative, Raschid. Tib was for many years the prince of African slave-dealers and traders, a man of vast wealth and influence, and the friend of Stanley during his explorations. As the latter's second lieutenant during the Emin Pacha relief expedition, he performed efficient service. Any will remember him as a man who, spite numerous faults, was true to his word, inflexibly faithful to his friends and almost every instance, the ally of the whites and the intermediary between them and the wild tribes of the interior.

Raschid, who succeeded to Tib's authority and wealth, was also a man of many qualities, and might have exercised powerful and beneficent influence, had it not been for his affiliation with the slave trade. As Vali (or Governor) of Stanley Falls, he was capable and efficient. Stanley Falls is a large trading station near the mouth of the Congo, about fifteen hundred miles from the river's mouth. It is the head of up-river navigation for steamships, and is designated by explorers as "the Port of Equatorial Africa." There Raschid lived in a sort of rude state with his wife, who is supposed to have been a full-blooded native African, Raschid being an Arab, with the aquiline and almost delicate features that are sometimes found among Arabs of pure descent. Our photograph on this page (taken prior to 1890, and furnished through the courtesy of Mr. Chateauin, the well-known traveler), shows the Vali and his wife and servant, Raschid himself, sword in hand, being the central figure of the group. It will be observed that the costume of the woman is peculiar, even to the verge of masculinity. Her plain turban is in marked contrast to Raschid's picturesque Arab head-dress, while her nose-ring, abundant finger-rings and heavy ivory anklets show that she is above the vanities of African women generally. Husband and wife both wear black-soled, wooden sandals, with an odd iron attachment on the toes, which keeps the sandal in place by pressure. When the Congo State officials decided, years ago, to suppress the encroaching

Arab slave-dealers by force, Raschid, who was in sympathy with the Arab rebels against the State, was driven out of the territory with the others. A series of crushing defeats was administered to the slave-chiefs from which they have not recovered. It is not improbable that Raschid, having cast his fortunes on the side of slavery and probably his sword also, may have fallen in some of the numerous engagements that have been fought within the last five years in that part of the "Dark Continent." At all events, the once handsome and dashing Arab Vali, of Stanley Falls, is no more heard of in African affairs, and has apparently passed out of public sight forever.

A Concert of the Birds.

Dr. R. E. Maxson, of Syracuse, N. Y., sends us a most interesting account of an autumnal bird concert, he heard on Round Island. He writes: "It was the harvest month of October. During an early morning walk, along the main channel of the majestic St. Lawrence, beautifully fringed with evergreen and other shrubs and trees, with a small cultivated plot, inland, where many weeds and grasses had sprung up, furnishing seeds for the birds. I was suddenly, at dawn, greeted with the merry voices of the little 'chipping birds.' Halting to investigate, I discovered that what appeared to be the music of a thousand of their voices, in sweet concert, proceeded from a small densely leaved cedar tree, at the border of the cultivated plot of ground, from which they evidently drew their daily food of seeds and grain.

"The density of the foliage of their cedar was so great that the songsters could not be seen: except, now and then, when one would dart out, between their hymns, fly a few feet, then back, when the chorus would be renewed, and so on for perhaps half an hour, when they all came out together and flew away in different directions, about sunrise.

"I have heard three thousand human voices, in concert, by royal command, at the Sydenham Crystal Palace, near London, and many others; but I have yet to hear a more lovely concert of praise, than that in the cedar bush, on Round Island, in the St. Lawrence."

Miserable Misunderstandings.

There is nothing that will cause greater misery in the home, or among friends, than those wretched misunderstandings that occasionally creep up in almost everyone's experience. Between husband and wife, or brothers and sisters, they are productive of untold suffering, alienating the love and dividing the interests of those who should be very near and dear to each other.

It was of such cases that the late Phillips Brooks once said: "You who are letting miserable misunderstandings run on from year to year; you who are keeping wretched quarrels alive because you cannot quite make up your mind that now is the day to sacrifice your pride and kill them; you who are passing some one sullenly upon the street, not speaking, out of some silly spite, and yet knowing that it would fill you with shame and remorse if you heard that that one were dead to-morrow morning; or letting your friend's heart ache for a word of appreciation or sympathy, which you mean to give some day—if you could know and see and feel all of a sudden that 'the time is short,' how it would break the spell! How you would go instantly and do the thing which you might never have another chance to do!"

There are few misunderstandings so deeply rooted that a little concession, a word softly spoken, or a frank sentence avowing regret, might not heal.

Gloomy Homes.

What sunshine is to the life of the animal and vegetable worlds, cheerfulness is to the home—an indispensable adjunct if the home-life is to be an enjoyable one. That household where gloom and solemnity alone reign is devoid of any attraction for those whose lives are tied up in the home. No soul can thrive and grow into spiritual beauty which is shut up in the gloom and darkness of a sinful and ungodly home. It is the Sun of Righteousness that brings warmth to the soul. It is this that makes home radiant. This is sunshine itself. It is worth all it costs to have a sunny disposition, but those who have it not can learn to cultivate it. It is something which men can attain. It is something into which all can grow, and our domestic felicity and happiness largely depend on the possession of a sunny soul. It is through the soul that men are made to reflect the divine likeness, and from this must go out that principle that elevates, purifies and blesses.

EX-VALI RASCHID, HIS WIFE AND SERVANT.

Country Children.

There is a compensation for the little folks who live in the rural districts, which atones largely for what they might enjoy, did they live in the cities. Their wholesome, daily life, with their experience in the care and repair of the houses, barns and fences and the endless variety of equipment; their acquaintance with the habits, use, and care of the different kinds of domestic animals; clean, wholesome habits and pure recreations, and, in short, the rare privilege of being an active part of the grandest all-around school for a child—that of a well managed country-home—these are what cause the students from the country to distance their city brothers and sisters in all that pertains to quickness of observation, accuracy of judgment, and strength of character. With the population flocking to the cities, this wholesome, healthful country training is lost; yet in many places in the cities the kindergarten and manual training are beginning to take its place. However, the opportunities in this direction are altogether too small. No boy or girl should ever undervalue the privilege of a youth spent in the country.

Popular Girls.

To wish to be popular, says a writer in Harper's, is a laudable wish and in itself not wrong. There is a temptation to wrong in it if the desire be carried so far that, in order to become popular, the girl sacrifices valuable qualities of character, as, for instance, independence of judgment and sincerity. But there is no need of this. The girl who chooses to be popular needs first to be unselfish. She must not consider her own ends first nor chiefly. The atmosphere enfolding her must be that of love and kindness. You know how some girls always try to have the best things, the best places, the pleasant times, while they do not try to pass the good times along to others. These are not popular girls. Nobody can be fond of a selfish person. Again, a really popular person must have courage. Courage enough to be a leader. There are only a few leaders in any city, or school, or other corner of the world. Most people are followers. I heard of a leader this morning. She went to a boarding-school a long way off from home. Among the teachers there was a little shy Miss Somebody whom the girls did not like. They made fun of her prim manner and her queer tow-colored hair, and a sort of mincing walk the poor lady had, and they did not see that she was really a very learned woman who could teach them a great deal if they would attend to her. Maria Matilda observed the state of affairs, and decided that it was unjust, so she championed the little teacher. She sent flowers to her desk. She listened respectfully when Miss Diffidence was in the preceptor's chair. She began to be very fond of her, and discovered that Miss Diffidence was really a dear, only frightened out of her wits, among a crowd of unfeeling girls. Before long Maria Matilda changed the whole situation, and, she being a born leader, the rest followed her willingly. I need not add that Maria Matilda is popular, very popular.

He Would Rather be a Boy.

A pretty incident is related of the young king of Spain. One day, while out with his nurse, the little monarch saw some lads of his own age at play. He made strenuous efforts to escape from his attendant and join the youthful frolickers. "Oh, but you must not," said the nurse, restraining him. "Why may I not go and play with them?" he asked. "Why, because—because you are a little king," was the reply. "Then, if you please, nurse, I would rather be a boy," the young king rejoined. And he gazed longingly at the little group of urchins, who probably in their hearts were envying him, little knowing that the dignity of royalty was nothing in his eyes compared with the pure, innocent sports of childhood.

Dolls that Brought Comfort.

Mrs. Margaret Bottome, the founder of the Order of King's Daughters, recently related this touching incident of her experience in ministering to the sick: "Before I left Europe last summer, a great box came to me filled with dolls, all dressed, and the request came with it that I should have them sent to a children's hospital. There is a hospital in the city of New York for consumptive children, as well as for older people with the same disease, and I gave the dolls to a physician who is connected with that hospital. He said afterward he wished I could have seen the children trooping toward him, each carrying a doll. But the most touching thing to me was what the nurse told the doctor, that after every child was furnished with a doll, there were a number left, and the poor women, dying with consumption, asked if each might have a doll. They all wanted them, and to each the dolls were given, and the nurse said she could not have dreamed of their being such a comfort to those poor, sick women. There were just enough dolls for all."

Heredity's Limitations.*

HIS doctrine of heredity is no new discovery. Why, men must have seen from the very dawn of human history that parents transmit to their children, not merely their outward form and features, but many of the moral tendencies of their nature. And this doctrine of heredity was one of the chief articles of the Christian creed for many centuries, and was stated in a form which justly provoked fierce moral resentment. The doctrine of Original Sin was the theological anticipation of the scientific doctrine of heredity, just as the doctrine of Monotheism was the theological anticipation of the scientific doctrine of the unity of the material universe and the universal supremacy of law.

It is true that the whole conditions of my life have been determined for me by my ancestors. My strength of muscle, the soundness of my heart and lungs, the limits of my intellectual capacity, have all been settled for me by my birth. And as the result of the moral character of my ancestors my moral life is one of comparative ease or of severe difficulty. But though the conditions of life have been determined for me, my life itself is my own, and that has not been determined for me. The material with which I should work has been given,—the way in which I should treat it has not been given. I may have been born sluggish, I have to determine whether I will yield or not to my natural tendency to sluggishness. I may have been born with susceptibility to violence of temper: it does not follow that my temper is to be violent; I have to determine whether I will struggle with my susceptibility, and subdue and chain down the temper which would hurry me into many grievous offences. I may have been born with a tendency to sullenness and to gloom: but listening to the teaching of the Christian faith and discovering that joy is an element of Christian perfection, it becomes just as much my duty to struggle against sullenness and gloom as to struggle against any gross sensual vice, and I must set my whole heart and strength to resist and subdue my natural tendency. I may have been born with a craving for physical excitement. Is that to be my excuse if I come home drunk? God forbid. The craving has to be wrestled with, smitten down. I have so to discipline myself that that craving shall be continually checked.

And to God—to God—some of the noblest forms of moral life may be found where to your eyes and to mine there is the least dignity and grace. You were born under felicitous circumstances; but to reach the virtue which you attained without effort, another man may have to exert incessant energy. His dearly bought excellence, though inferior to that which you have easily achieved, is to God infinitely nobler and more precious than the goodness which you, without effort, have accomplished. Each man has to "give an account of himself to God."

One man is placed under conditions—conditions not of his own choice, conditions to which he was destined—which make it possible for him to do very little beyond getting the rough ore of goodness out of the black and gloomy mine. He has got it with the sweat of his brow, with pain, with peril. To him God will say, "Well done!" Another man has the ore at his feet to start with. It is not enough for him to bring that to God. For him there is a different task. In the fires of self-discipline he has to liberate the ore from its dross, and to produce the pure metal. It is enough that one man should bring the rough ore to God; this man must bring pure metal extracted from it. And a third has the metal to begin with. He fails, and fails disastrously, unless he works it up into forms of noble usefulness and gracious beauty. Each man will have to "give account of himself to God," and only God can judge of the worth of each man's work, because only God knows the conditions under which each man's work is carried on. I suppose that the words which came to the lips of one of the school-fellows of William Ellery Channing sometimes come to the lips of other children on this side of the Atlantic, and the thought which they express has come into the minds of many who are no longer children. When Channing was a very little boy, his schoolmaster said to one of his school-fellows, "Why are you not a good child like William Channing?" "Oh," said the boy, "it is so easy for William Channing to be good." We, perhaps, have looked round upon friends of ours to whom the conflict we have to maintain is altogether unnecessary. The foes we have to fight with they never meet. The victories which we have to win for ourselves were won for them generations ago by the ancestors whose blood is in their veins. Shall we complain? God forbid. Let us do for posterity what their ancestors have done for them, taking the rough conditions of our actual life, making the best of them, winning no praise from men for what we accomplish—for they know not the difficulty of the work—rejoicing in this humbly and reverently, that we have to give account of ourselves to God.

In a Submarine Garden.*

WHILE Jack (the driver), was working below, he ran across a place where pearl shells seemed more plentiful than usual, and, according to the custom in such cases, he gave three pulls and a shake on the lifeline, as a signal for Ketchee to drop the Norma's anchor, so as to allow him to thoroughly cover the ground.

Previous to this the boat had been slowly drifting with the current, Jack following her. The "patch," as places where shells are plenty are called, was a veritable submarine garden, abounding in all kinds of sponge, coral, and other sea growths, some of them ten and twelve feet high and twenty-five feet around the base, a place where Jack had to watch his lifeline and airpipes very closely, for fear they might get entangled among the multitudinous stems and tracery. The shells were thick and in a few minutes Jack had his bag full to overflowing; so, hauling down sufficient slack on the lifeline, he tied the bag to it and signaled Ketchee to pull it up, who, having emptied it, returned it in the same way. In this manner bag after bag went up, until the total number of shells amounted to several hundreds, and Jack began to feel tired. Gathering shells at this rate is something like, thought he, as he shook the sweat off his face. One more bag full and I shall have to go up for a mouthful of fresh air.

Down came the empty bag again, and off Jack started after three or four large shells that lay half-hidden in the shadow of a coral cup.

He stooped to pick them up, and as he did so a shoal of fish darted past his face glass, a mighty wave seemed to strike him and rolled him over and over on the rock bottom, and everything became as dark as night.

A nameless terror took possession of Jack for a moment, as he lay half-stunned among the long sea grasses, for his first thought was that he had been stricken blind; but as he picked himself up, to his unspeakable joy the light gradually came back again, and he saw that the darkness had been caused by the stirring up of a thin layer of mud that covered the ocean floor.

Suddenly he felt his right foot slip as if he had trodden on an anemone, and at the same instant there closed around his leg a vise-like grip that chained him to the spot.

Finding himself in the fatal clutches of a monster Tridacna, an exaggerated species of clam which measured three feet in length and weighed some five hundred pounds, and exposed to the mercy of sharks, should they come that way, our hero for the moment lost all control of himself, and crying aloud with fear and pain, he tore frantically at the corrugated edges of shell which held him.

Finally Jack with an effort calmed himself, and no sooner had he regained his presence of mind than he whipped out his sheath knife and commenced to cut vigorously at the interior of the mollusk, the shell being held partly open by his leg, knowing well that if he would reach the heart of the fish, the muscles would relax and leave him free.

As he slashed and probed into the flabby mass, his knife clicked against something hard, and with a diver's instinct he put his hand down and felt for it.

The next moment he drew forth an immense pearl, perfect in shape, color, and lustre. And then by degrees the shell opened until Jack was able to step out—a prisoner no longer.

Shall We Know Each Other?*

RECOGNITION is implied in the Scriptural representations of heaven. Take the figure of a mansion. Jesus says, "In my Father's house are many mansions;" what is the idea here, but that of a family at home, and this means that the good who are separated here, shall be united there, and this implies recognition, for leave out recognition and the most essential feature of a home is gone. To poor sorrowing mortals mourning for lost ones, Jesus says, in substance, Let not your heart be troubled, there are mansions in heaven, where you shall find your lost ones. And that finding of friends which is to heal the sorrow caused by the loss of them must include recognition.

Take the figure of a feast: at our Father's table we shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and all the ancient worthies, but what attraction is there in this, if they are all to be strangers? If we are never to distinguish them from any others in the great congregation? If we are not to know them, there is no force in this language, which was evidently presented as a motive to stimulate our faith and effort. And if we shall know the patriarchs, prophets and apostles, then why may not the presence of those with whom we were most intimately associated in this life constitute the sweetest feature in that blessed reunion? If, for our happiness, God will enable us to know the ancient worthies of former ages, whom we never saw in the flesh, will he not, for the same reason, enable us to know those whom we knew and loved in our earthly homes.

Take the figure of the wedding supper. And in what respect does this represent heaven? Not that there will be a literal feast, or marriage ceremony; but it represents the joyful occasion when friends long separated shall meet in a glorious reunion in our Father's house. And when the Son of God employs this scene to represent heaven, he introduces the most intensely interesting and precious thought that can be awakened in the human soul, namely, that heaven is the great home-land of humanity, the Father's house full of mansions, the home of the soul, and hence it is a state of literal and blessed reunion of friends, and one of two things must be true, either the inhabitants of heaven do or do not know each other; and now which of these theories is most in accord with the teachings and illustrations of Scripture, with the indications of analogy, and most in harmony with the conclusions of reason and experience so far as they go?

Some people entertain the idea that in heaven all the relations of earth, intellectual as well as physical, shall not only be blotted out and obliterated but absolutely forgotten, or that we shall see nothing, know nothing, and care for nothing but the praise and adoration of the Lord Jesus, which shall absorb all our powers, and all our time, to the exclusion of everything else. But when we first found Christ in the pardon of our sins, did we forget our families? And do we lose interest in them in proportion as we get nearer to Christ? No; the very contrary is true, the nearer we get to Christ the more sacred become the ties that bind us to our families. And can it be possible that when we get to heaven, and bow at the very feet of Jesus, that we shall forget our loved ones altogether? In the presence of the Lord Jesus shall we lose the knowledge that we ever had a father, or mother, or wife, or husband, or brothers, or sisters? And so, spending eternity in the very midst of those whose voices and smiles were the light and music of our earthly home, shall we never find one who knelt by our side at family prayer?

The marriage supper of the Lamb will not be a convocation of strangers, but a home gathering in our Father's house; and I believe we shall have the power to know each one, so that there will not be a stranger in all heaven; and, of course those who constituted our family circle in Christ, shall be there, and shall be known as such. You tell me that heaven is the temple of God, that it is the city of God, that it is a beautiful city, and all these representations clothe heaven with immortal beauties and resistless attractions that entrance my senses, and captivate and fascinate my soul! But, oh, when you tell me that heaven is the home of the soul, the brightest vision of all unfolds before me! For there, amid the ineffable glories, I recognize familiar faces, and hear familiar voices, and my heart swells and throbs with the hope of a blessed reunion with loved ones on yonder peaceful shore, where the parting hand shall never be given and "good-by" shall never be spoken! Yes, reason and Scripture and common-sense all unite in confirmation of the soul's immortal conviction that we shall know each other better when the mists have cleared away.

Importance of Early Training.*

THERE is no doubt that bad training is one of the chief predisposing causes of crime. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it," and "the child is father to the man," are sacred and profane truism on every one's lips. It has been suggested that, inasmuch as the parent is responsible for a debt incurred by his child whilst under age, he should also morally be held responsible for any crime committed in the like way, for it must follow that the field of the mind not cultivated with healthful blossoms will run wild with weeds. To insure a happy result, to obviate crime, the culture must be commenced at the dawn of its development by the mother, for "just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined." The rough-hewing of the great model of mankind, Alfred, was begun by his mother almost in the nursery, and it is a fine eulogy, even on his memory, to record that it was a psychical influence, a literary reward, that was his first stimulus to good.

It matters not what may be the character of the crime, in all cases, progress from venial to bad, from bad to worse, and thence to extremes, is the invariable trait of a criminal career; consequences are first calculated with anxiety, then merely weighed against immediate gain, and, finally, disregarded altogether.

By careful youthful training and tuition, the development of the nobler organ in man commences—the intellect; but we must economize, and not expect too much at first or we shall mar instead of make; and instead of sending rich and fertile blood to the brain, it will be a poor and impoverished fluid. The pride of progress is excited very early in life, and if this stimulus takes the right course it will continue to a life of utility.

Amongst even the ragged schools in England this desire exists with the pupils, who are ever eager to answer a question first, and to be high up in the form.

Laborers With God.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor topic for the Week Beginning Feb. 2.
(Cor. 3: 6-23.)

GROWTH, development, and service are ideas indissolubly associated in the teaching of Christ and his Apostles with Christian life. Nothing is more remote from their idea of the Christian, than the crystalized condition which too frequently satisfies the converted man. He has passed through certain experiences, complied with certain forms, and he regards the transaction as complete. A support is in his possession, putting him within the only gates that figure in so many antiquated sermons, and he sees himself, in anticipation, treading the golden pavement and twanging a golden harp, for the first time in his existence. If that were the issue, the only issue of the Christian life, it would not seem to have been worth all the suffering and all the agony Christ endured to win it for us. Christ came and suffered that he might impart life to men, a vital life which should permeate their being, eliminating all evil, strengthening the good, making them stronger and better and more helpful to their fellowmen. It would have been possible for Almighty God to have done this at once by a miracle in every case. God could have so arranged it that Baptism should have made a man perfect at a dip, or sprinkling. Or he could have given perfection as a gift, as we believe that he really does. But that is not God's way of working. He imparts power to become good, and is for man to use it. It is man to decide what he will do. He has an unlimited supply of grace to draw upon, and according to his faith will be the rate of his progress. He is a laborer with God.

The work before every man at his conversion is pretty much what the mission of Israel was at the death of Joshua. He may rest content with being in the kingdom, or he may seek to possess it. Enemies in the land that ought to be driven out, but they will not go of their own accord. They will only be driven out by hard fighting. But God wishes them driven out, and stands ready to give all the power needed for the task. The signs in every man's soul are easily recognizable. The man himself knows them, if he knows himself. They differ in different constitutions. With the worst is ill-temper, with another it is pride, with another it is cupidity, with another it is sensualism, and so on through the whole long, black list. They may remain, and as the Apostle says, the man may be saved, but it is a poor salvation, and it is likely that he will start the next life handicapped, or by a discipline that the Apostle compares to fire. It ought to be every man's holy ambition to cultivate his little plot of land—his own soul—getting rid of the weeds, and bringing fruit from it. It may be a small plot; if so, the responsibility is the less, but it ought to produce all the fruit that can be made to grow upon it. And it is with this work as it is with our gardens; we cannot make any tree or plant grow. The seed is sown; and the sun and the sunshine, and the abundant life of the soil produce the rest. We are laborers with God. Or to revert to the Apostle's figure of a building. The foundation is laid, but it rests with the man himself how high and how beautiful it shall be. The materials must be of his own selecting, and he ought to select them with the fact ever before him that whatever he does will be tried as by fire.

What Matters It?

Written for "The Christian Herald."

THERE are other lands than ours.
Lands of sunshine and of flowers;
Where, throughout the jeweled day,
Sportive children laugh and play;
Mocking care, and age, and all,
With the magic of their call:
And, where youthful innocence
Smiles with blank indifference
On the problems with which men Battle all in vain. But then!
What need they fear, when to them is given
To dwell with the angels of God in Heaven?

There are other homes than ours
Hid away 'neath shady bowers;
Where, perhaps, through ages long,
Might has linked itself with wrong.
Ah, but hear the pleasant chime,
Childhood's laughter rings sublime!
Warbling songs in language strange,
Nature hails! Why dost thou change Their happy lot! Oh, grant that youth
May ever be the shrine of truth.
Suspend thy laws yet once again
That age may know its hopes. But then!
'Tis all the same, for to such it is given
To dwell with the angels of God in Heaven.

The Atonement.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

THE everlasting Son of God,
What has he done for me?
He came from splendor, bright, above,
And died upon the tree;
He died that I eternal life
Through ages might possess,
He died the world to save from sin,
He died the race to bless.

Oh, sacrifice that mortal man
Can never estimate!
It saves me not alone from hell,
But from a sinful state.
And, through the sacrifice he made,
I some day shall behold
The pearly gates, the jasper walls,
The streets of burnished gold.

How grateful I to Jesus am
For what he's done for me!
Oh, Saviour, come and help me now
To be more true to thee,
And grant that I may lead some soul
From darkness into light,
To joys no seraph's tongue can tell,
From sin and endless night!

The Prophecy on the Mount.

The Double Application of our Lord's Predictions Recorded in Matt. 24.

THE more closely we examine this chapter, the more clearly does it appear that Christ had in mind when he uttered his predictions both the near event of the destruction of Jerusalem and the farther event of his Second Coming which should close the dispensation.

The "abounding of iniquity," and the consequent "waxing cold of the love of many" (ver. 12), would seem to belong especially to the period prior to the Advent, and are in exact accordance, as every student of prophecy must be aware, with numerous predictions, both of the Old and New Testaments, which undeniably refer to that event.

The "preaching of the Gospel for a witness among all nations" (ver. 14), is also, without question, to be regarded, not as a sign preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, but—as the emphatic words, "and then shall the end come," are sufficient to determine—as a marked and specially noteworthy token that the Lord is, indeed, at hand.

The "setting up of the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, in the holy place" (ver. 15) would seem evidently to have received some fulfillment at the destruction of Jerusalem. Many in that time of trouble, remembering Christ's warning, when they saw the Temple desecrated by Antiochus fled to Pella and their lives were preserved. But it cannot have then received—and it therefore still awaits—its complete fulfillment in events connected with the Second Advent.

Thus far this prophecy, if only the possession of this two-fold character be allowed to it, is by no means difficult of interpretation. It is remarkably free from either symbol or metaphor. It is, moreover, most distinct in its utterance. We can take it in one hand, and the history of the destruction of Jerusalem in the other, and, comparing the two together, we can gain from this as fully as from any other portion of God's Prophetic Word the substantial evidence of the inspiration of the Sacred Volume—the proof incontrovertible that "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." We can point to the site upon which the once proud buildings of the Temple stood, and to the recent records of "the Palestine Exploration Society," in proof of how accurately the words of our Lord's discourse, as here recorded, have been accomplished. Having done this, may we not triumphantly ask if there be any room for doubt, or question, or misgiving as to the equally literal accomplishment in the glorious Second Appearing of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ of each and every particular foretold in the prophecy, which has not as yet completely come to pass?

From verse 36, however, to the end of the chapter, we get upon altogether new ground, and encounter statements and warnings which it is not at first sight easy to reconcile with what has gone before.

In the former portion of the chapter we read of an Advent preceded and heralded by many most remarkable and portentous events—an Advent which cannot take place until these events shall have each and all of them occurred. So fully must this be the case that our Lord speaks (ver. 32, 33) of the occurrence of these signs as betokening the nearness of his Coming, just as the buds upon the figtree most surely betoken the advent of Summer.

Chinese Christian Endeavorers.

Active Members of the Christian Endeavor Society in Conference.

TO Mrs. Geo. H. Hubbard, of Foochow, China, we are indebted for the following interesting report of a Convention of Christian Endeavor Societies in the district in which she and her husband are laboring for Christ:

"We have just held our Convention of Christian Endeavor Societies. Our first aim was to hold it in our largest church, which is called Geu-cio-Ding (Church of the Saviour), but the Christians were sure that would be quite too small, and their thought proved to be correct. So the Christian Endeavorers of that church hired a lot of cloth, had it sowed into large sheets with which they made a tent and spread it on the grassy lawn of our Pongang (Foochow suburb's station) compound. A rough platform was hastily erected, covered with a piece of carpeting, upon which stood two organs and the chairman's table and chair. Back of the platform were hung the banners of some of the societies, striking in their Chinese combinations of colored silks, the sentiments inscribed thereon in black velvet characters rich in thought. The benches were brought over from the church by the teachers and students themselves, a great innovation indeed, for the Chinese sentiment is that one who pretends to be anything of a scholar should never do anything manual, it is quite beneath his dignity and such work should be left to the police class.

I can assure you it was a pretty sight when we were all gathered together, with bright sunny sky above us, gentle breezes fanning our cheeks, green grass and smiling flowers about us—and God over all! Our Chairman for the day was the first one who signed his name as a Christian Endeavorer in all China, and he filled his position nobly. Even in our favored home and it would be difficult to find a young man who would perform his duties on such an occasion any better.

The programme of the day was much the same in miniature as what is given at some on like occasions. Three young ladies (native) played the organ to lead the singing which was rendered with zest and "understanding." After reading of 1 Cor. 3:8-9, 21-23 and a prayer, the pastor of the church gave an address of welcome. Such a gathering makes us comprehend, in some degree, what Christian unity is, and realize that we are all members of Christ's body and have equal share and interest in his work. Three minute reports showed total membership of Foochow district (I think this may not include the stations furthest away) to be 570. The largest society is that of the Church of the Saviour, 19 active, 10 associate, 12 honorary members, and the ranks of the actives are constantly increased from the associates.

A pastor of the English Church Mission of Kucheng, near which place the late dreadful massacre of missionaries took place, was present and said: "It rejoices me to be present at such a gathering as this. At Kucheng we have two Christian Endeavor Societies, one in the Methodist mission and one in our own; they have one much to promote mutual love. The last meeting which the dear lamented Mr. Stewart held with us native Christians, was just the night before he started for his summer vacation at fated Hua-sang; he urged us to be very earnest in the work for the Master, for we do not know when the Lord will appear at his Second Coming. Little did he or any of us think how near at hand was the summons to meet the Lord and wait with him the hour when he shall appear in glory."

Another pastor of the same mission from the city church said he felt like a little boy. Christian Endeavor was a new thing to him but he wanted to learn more and more about it. A society had been formed in his church, and already he could see marked improvement along the lines of harmony and mutual helpfulness. Their contributions have greatly increased, and their desire to save souls is such that no matter whom they may meet their tongues cannot be restrained from talking about Jesus doctrine." Here are a few thoughts given by the natives themselves during the open parliament:

"Flowers brought to decorate the church Sunday morning help to keep the audience awake."

"Christian Endeavor is like a tree laden with good fruit, of which three special kinds may be mentioned: First, development of ability; second, interest in missions; third, improvement of the deportment of pupils in school."

"Christian Endeavor is a great help in daily prayer and Bible-reading."

"It helps one to stick to the topic when speaking in meeting."

Two societies have Thanksgiving boxes into which members drop cash when they have something to be specially thankful for.

One sends its members out two by two Sunday afternoons to use the time they used to idle away, in talking about Christ in adjacent villages.

One speaker said, "Sharp Peak has a telegraph line to Foochow and by means of it we may be in communication with you here. Now Christian Endeavor is like the telegraph wire; through it we all know we have each other's sympathy and prayers the whole wide world round."

So for five hours that day the autumn breezes bore the words of eternal life and sweet melodies of praise, from that Christian oasis into the dreary desert of idolatry. Three hundred souls came from heathen darkness, and perhaps, for the first time in their lives, caught a glimpse of Christian light. May God hasten the day when the Sun of Righteousness may shine forth in all his glory and dispel the dark shadows of sin-trodden Cathay.

FOOCHOW, CHINA.

A Prayer Test.

When Bengalese peasants are received into the Christian Church, the missionary usually asks them some simple questions about their faith. This examination by the European missionary often seems rather dreadful to these poor, simple peasants.

One man, who was specially shy, was afraid he should not be able to pass. "Sahib," he exclaimed, when his turn came, "do not examine me, I cannot answer any questions." "What must I do, then?" asked the missionary. "Let me pray, sahib," said the man; "I believe I can do that." They all knelt down, and this man, who had been so embarrassed before his fellow-men, spoke so freely out of his heart to his Maker, prayed so earnestly and piously, and with such a thorough understanding of the Gospel, that he needed no further examination.

A Moorish Dispensary.

In the course of his description of life in Morocco, in "The Church at Home and Abroad," Rev. James Johnston thus describes the course of treatment adopted by the Moorish physician: "For a woman to be ill in Morocco is a misfortune indeed. If in a state of suffering, the Moorish woman is allowed, infrequently, to go to the native doctor, who is seated in the marketplace, surrounded by the implements of his calling. An array of flat irons, a small firepot of charcoal, and a huge black bottle constitute his stock in trade. Whatever the disease, external or internal, there is invariably one remedy. He places the iron in the fire until it is hot, and then applies it to the part affected, after which the patient must swallow a draught of a mysterious potion. What this barbarous ordeal entails may be more easily imagined than described. To the rescue of their suffering sisters from such misery, an increasing band of qualified lady physicians are devoting themselves, and they are welcomed where the male medical missionary is refused admission.

CONSUMPTION.

A scientific discussion of this dread disease, its cause, treatment and cure, by Dr. Robert Hunter, the father of inhalation and most eminent lung specialist of the day. After a period of research extending over half a century, Dr. Hunter explains his perfected discovery of a specific remedy for consumption, and proves its success not only scientifically but through the grateful testimonials of his patients. Dr. Hunter was for forty years the sole advocate of the germ theory of consumption which is now accepted by the medical profession throughout the world as the only correct theory—thus establishing beyond doubt his superior knowledge of this disease. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can obtain Dr. Hunter's book explaining his treatment without charge by addressing him at his residence, 117 West Forty-fifth street, New York.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

POWER OF EXAMPLE.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Judges 9: 48. "And Abimelech took an axe in his hand and cut down a bough from the trees, and laid it on his shoulder and said unto the people that were with him, What ye have seen me do, make haste and do as I have done. And all the people likewise cut down every man his bough."

ABIMELECH is a name malodorous in Bible history, and yet full of profitable suggestion. Buoys are black and uncomely, but they tell where the rocks are. The snake's rattle is hideous, but it gives timely warning. From the piazza of my summer home, night by night, I saw a lighthouse fifteen miles away, not placed there for adornment, but to tell mariners to stand off from that dangerous point. So all the iron-bound coast of moral danger is marked with Saul, and Herod, and Rehoboam, and Jezebel, and Abimelech. These bad people are mentioned in the Bible not only as warnings, but because there were sometimes flashes of good conduct in their lives worthy of imitation. God sometimes drives a very straight nail with a very poor hammer.

The city of Shechem had to be taken, and Abimelech and his men were to do it. I see the dust rolling up from their excited march. I hear the shouting of the captains and the yell of the besiegers. The swords clack sharply on the parrying shields, and the vociferation of two armies in death grapple is horrible to hear. The battle goes on all day; and as the sun is setting Abimelech and his army cry: "Surrender!" to the beaten foe. And, unable longer to resist, the city of Shechem falls; and there are pools of blood, and dismembered limbs, and glazed eyes looking up beggingly for mercy that war never shows, and dying soldiers with their head on the lap of mother, or wife, or sister, who have come out for the last offices of kindness and affection; and a groan rolls across the city, stopping not, because there is no spot for it to rest, so full is the place of other groans. A city wounded! A city dying! A city dead! Wail for Shechem, all ye who know the horrors of a sacked town!

As I look over the city, I can find only one building standing, and that is the temple of the god Berith. Some soldiers outside of the city in a tower, finding that they can no longer defend Shechem, now begin to look out for their own personal safety, and they fly to this temple of Berith. They go within the door, shut it, and they say: "Now we are safe. Abimelech has taken the whole city, but he cannot take this temple of Berith. Here we are safe." O Berith, the god! do your best for these men. If you have thunderbolts, strike for them. But how shall Abimelech and his army take this temple of Berith and the men who are there fortified? Will they do it with sword? Nay. Will they do it with spear? Nay. With battering-ram, rolled up the hillside, and against the door, and then he says to his men: "You do the same." They are obedient to their commander. There is a struggle as to who shall have axes. The whole wood is full of bending boughs, and the cracking and the hacking, and the cutting, until every one of the host has a limb of a tree cut down, and not only that, but has put it on his shoulder just as Abimelech showed him how. Are these men all armed with the tree branch? The reply comes "All armed." And they march on. Oh, what a strange army, with that strange equipment! They come up to the foot of the temple at Berith, and Abimelech takes his limb of a tree and throws it down; and the first platoon of soldiers come up and they throw down their branches; and the second platoon, and the third, until all around about the temple of Berith there is a pile of tree-branches. The Shechemites look out from the window of the temple upon what seems to them childish play on the part of their enemies. But soon the flints are struck, and the spark begins to kindle the brush, and the flame comes up all through the pile, and the red elements leap to the casement, and the woodwork begins to blaze, and one arm of flame is thrown up on the right side of the temple, and another arm of flame is thrown up on the left side of the temple, until they clasp their lurid palms under the wild night sky, and the cry of "Fire!" within, and "Fire!" without, announces the terror, and the strangulation, and the doom of the Shechemites, and the complete overthrow of the temple of the god Berith. Then there went up a shout, long and loud, from the stout lungs and swarthy chests of Abimelech and his men, as they stood amid the ashes and the dust crying: "Victory! victory!"

Now I learn first from this subject, the folly of depending upon any one form of tactics in anything we have to do for this world or for God. Look over the weaponry of olden times—javelins, battle-axes, habergeons, and show me a single weapon with which Abimelech and his men could have gained such complete triumph. It is no easy thing to take a temple thus armed. I have seen a house where, during revolutionary times, a man and his wife kept back a whole regiment hour after hour, because they were inside the house, and the assaulting soldiers were outside the house. Yet here Abimelech and his army come up, they surround this temple, and they capture it without the loss of a single man on the part of Abimelech, although I suppose some of the old Israelitish heroes told Abimelech: "You are only going up there to be cut to pieces." Yet you are willing to testify to-day that by no other method could that temple so easily, so thoroughly, have been taken. Fathers and mothers, brethren and sisters in Jesus Christ, what the Church must do to-day, to-day, is that any plan is right, is lawful, is best, is the only way to win the temple of the world for God. We are very apt to stick to the old modes of attack. We put on the old-style coat of mail. We come up with the sharp, keen, glittering steel spear of argument, expecting in that way to take the castle; but they have a thousand spears where we have ten. And so the castle of sin stands. Oh, my friends, we will never capture this world for God by any keen sabre of sarcasm, by any glittering lances of rhetoric, by any sapping and mining of profound disquisition, by any gunpowdery explosions of indignation, by sharpshootings of wit, by howitzers of mental strength made to swing shell five miles, by cavalry horses gorgeously caparisoned pawing the air. In vain all the attempts on the part of these ecclesiastical foot soldiers, light horsemen, and grenadiers.

My friends, I propose a different style of tactics. Let each one go to the forest of God's promise and invitation, and hew down a branch, and put it on his shoulder, and let us all come around these obstinate iniquities, and then, with this pile, kindled by the fires of a holy zeal and the flames of a consecrated life, we will burn them out. What steel cannot do, fire may. And I announce myself in favor of any plan of religious attack that succeeds—any plan of religious attack, however radical, however odd, however unpopular, however hostile to all the conventionalities of Church and State. If one style of prayer does not do the work, let us try another style. If the Church music of to-day does not get the victory, then let us make the assault with a backwoods chorus. If a prayer-meeting at half-past seven in the evening does not succeed, let us have one as early in the morning as when the Angel found wrestling Jacob too much for him. If a sermon with the three authorized heads does not do the work, then let us have a sermon with twenty heads, or no heads at all. We want more heart in our song, more heart in our almsgiving, more heart in our prayers, more heart in our preaching. Oh, for less of Abimelech's sword and more of Abimelech's conflagration! I had often heard sung artistically by four birds perched on their Sunday roost in the gallery, until I thought of Jenny Lind, and Nilsson, and Sontag, and all the other warblers; but there came not one tear to my eye, nor one master emotion to my heart. But one night I went down to the African Methodist meeting-house in Philadelphia, and at the close of the service a black woman, in the middle of the audience, began to sing that hymn, and all the audience joined in, and we were floated some three or four miles nearer heaven than I have ever been since. I saw with my own eyes that "fountain filled with blood"—red, agonizing, sacrificial, redemptive, and I heard the crimson splash of the wave as we all went down under it.

There is a fountain filled with blood

For sinners plunge beneath that flood Lose all their guilty stains.

Oh, my friends, the Gospel is not a syllogism; it is not casuistry; it is not polemics, or the science of squabbles. It is blood-red fact; it is warm-hearted invitation; it is leaping, bounding, flying good news; it is efflorescent with all light; it is rubescent with all summery glow; it is arborescent with all sweet shade. I have seen the sun rise on Mount Washington, and from the Tip-top House; but there was no beauty in that compared with the day-spring from on high when Christ gives light to a soul. I have heard Parepa sing; but there was no music in that compared with the voice of Christ when he said: "Thy sins are forgiven thee; go in peace." Good news! Let every one cut down a branch of this tree of life and wave it. Let him throw it down and kindle it. Let all the way from Mount Zalmon to Shechem be filled with the tossing joy. Good news! This bonfire of the Gospel shall consume the last temple of sin, and will illumine the sky with apocalyptic joy, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. Any new plan that makes a man quit his sin, and that prostrates a wrong, I am as much in favor of as though all the doctors, and the bishops, and the archbishops, and the synods, and the aca-demical gowmsmen of Christianity sanctioned it. The temple of Berith must come down, and I do not care how it comes.

Still further, I learn from this subject the power of example. If Abimelech had sat down on the grass, and told his men to go and get the boughs, and go out to the battle, they would never have gone all, or if they had, it would have been without any spirit or effective result; but when Abimelech goes with his own axe and hews down a branch, and with Abimelech's arm puts it on Abimelech's shoulder, and marches on, then, as the text says, all the people did the same. How natural that was! What made Gaius and Stonewall Jackson the magnetic commanders of this century? They always rode ahead. Oh, the overwhelming power of example! Here is a father on the wrong road; all his boys are on the wrong road. Here is a father who enlists for Christ; his children enlist. I saw in some of the picture galleries of Europe, that before many of the great works of the masters—the old masters—there would be sometimes four or five artists taking copies of the pictures. These copies they are going to carry with them, perhaps to distant lands; and I have thought that your life and character are a masterpiece, and it is being copied, and long after you are gone it will bloom or blast in the homes of those who knew you, and be a Gorgon or a Madonna. Look out what you say. Look out what you do. Eternity will hear the echo. The best sermon ever preached is a holy life. The best music ever chanted is a consistent walk. If you want others to serve God, serve him yourself. If you want others to shoulder their duty, shoulder yours. Where Abimelech goes his troops go. Oh, start out for heaven to-day, and your family will come after you, and your business associates will come after you, and your social friends will join you. With one branch of the tree of life for a baton, marshal just as many as you can gather. Oh, the infinite, the semi-omnipotent power of a good or bad example!

I saw last summer, near the beach, a wrecker's machine. It was a cylinder with some holes at the side, made for thrusting in of some long poles with stor leverage; and when there is any vessel in trouble or going to pieces in the offing, the wreckers shoot a rope out to the suffering men. They grasp it, and the wreckers turn the cylinder, and the rope winds around the cylinder, and those who are shipwrecked are saved. So at you feet, to-day, there is an influence with tremendous leverage. The rope attached to it swings far out into the billowy future. Your children, your children's children, and all the generations that are to follow, will grip that influence, and feel the long-reaching pull long after the figure on your tombstone are so near worn out that the visitor cannot tell whether it was 1806, or 1796, or 1606, that you died.

Still further, I learn from this subject the advantage of concerted action. Abimelech had merely gone out with one tree-branch, the work would not have been accomplished, or if ten, twenty, or thirty men had gone; but when all the axes are lifted and all the sharp edges fall, and all these men carry each his tree-branch down and throw it about the temple, the victory is gained—the temple falls. My friends, where there is one man in the Church of God at this day shouldering his whole duty, there are a great many who never lift an axe or swing a bough. It seems to me as if there were ten drones in every hive to one bee; as though there were twenty sailors sound asleep in the ship's hammocks to four men on the stormy deck. It seems as if there were fifty thousand men belonging to the reserve corps, and only one thousand active combatants. Oh, we all want our boats to get over to the golden sands; but the most of us are seated either in the prow or in the stern, wrapped in our striped shawl, holding a big-handled sur-made, while others are blistered in the heat, and pull until the oar-locks groan, and the blades bend till they snap. Oh, you religious sleepy-heads, wake up! You have lain so long in one place that the rats and caterpillars have begun to crawl over you! What do you know, my brothers, about a living Gospel made to storm the world? Now, my idea of a Christian is a man on fire with zeal for God; and if our pulse ordinarily beats sixty times a minute when you think of other themes, and talk about other themes, if your pulse does not go up to seventy-five or eighty when you come to talk about Christ and heaven, it is because you do not know the one, and have a poor chance of getting the other.

In a former charge, one Sabbath, I took to the pulpit the church records, and I read them to the pulpit and opened them, and said: "Brethren, here are the church records. I find a great many of you whose names are down here are off duty." Some were afraid I would read the names, for at that time some of them were deep in the first kind of oil stocks, and were idle as Christians. But if ministers of Christ to-day should bring the church records into the pulpit and read, oh, what a flutter there would be! There would not be fans enough in church to keep the people cool. I do not know but it would be a good thing if the minister once in a while should bring the church records into the pulpit and call the roll, for that is what I consider every church record to be, merely a muster-roll of the Lord's army; and the reading of it should reveal where every soldier is and what he is doing.

Suppose, in military circles, on the morning of battle, the roll is called, and out of a thousand men only a hundred answer in the regiment answered. What excitement there would be in the camp! What would the colonel say? What high talking there would be among the captains, and majors, and the adjutants! Suppose word came to headquarters that these delinquents excused themselves on the ground that they had overslept themselves, or the morning was damp and they were afraid of getting their feet wet, or that they were busy cooking rations. Friends, this is the morning of the day of God's Almighty's battle! Do you not see the troops? Hear ye not all the trumpets of heaven and all the drums of hell? Which side are you on? If you are on the right side, to what cavalry troop, to what artillery service, to what garrison do you belong? In other words, in what Sabbath School do you teach? In what prayer-meeting do you exhort? To what penitentiary do you declare eternal liberty? What almshouse do you announce the riches of heaven? What broken bone of sorrow have you ever set? Are you doing nothing? Is it possible that a man or woman sworn to be a follower of Jesus Christ is doing nothing? Then hide the terrible secret from the angels. Keep it away from the book of judgment. If you are doing nothing, do not let the world find it out, lest they charge your religion with being a false face. Do not let your cowardice and treason be heard among the martyrs about the throne, lest they forget the sanctity of the place and denounce your betrayal of that cause for which they died.

May the eternal God rouse us all to action! As for myself, I feel I would be named to die now and enter heaven unless I have accomplished something more decisive for the Lord that bought me. Oh, brethren, how swiftly the time goes by! It seems to me as if the years had gained the new power of locomotion—a kind of speed electric.

The temple of Berith is very broad and it is very high. It has been going up by the hands of men and devils, and no human engineering can demolish it; but if the seventy thousand ministers of Christ in this country could each take a branch of the tree of life, and all their congregations should do the same, and we should march on and throw these branches around the great temples of sin, and worldliness, and folly, it would need no match, or coal, or torch of ours to touch off the pile, for, as in the days of Elijah, fire would fall from heaven and kindle the bonfire of Christian victory over demolished sin.

Still further, I learn from this subject the danger of false refuges. As soon as these Shechemites got into the temple, they thought they were safe. They said: "Berith will take care of us. Abimelech may batter down everything else; he cannot batter down this temple where we are now hid." But very soon they heard the timbers crackling, and they were smothered with smoke, and they miserably died. I suppose every person in this audience this moment is stepping into some kind of refuge. Here you step in the tower of good works. You say: "I shall be safe in this refuge." The battlements are adorned; the steps are varnished; on the wall are pictures of all the suffering you have alleviated, and all the schools you have established, and all the fine things you have ever done. Up in that tower you feel you are safe. But hear you not the tramp of your unpardoned sins all around the tower? They each have a match. You are kindling the combustible material. You feel the heat and the suffocation. Oh! may you leap in time, the Gospel declaring: "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified."

"Well," you say, "I have been driven out of that tower; where shall I go?" Step into this tower of indifference. You say: "If this tower is attacked, it will be a great while before it is taken." You feel at ease. But there is an Abimelech, with ruthless assault, coming on. Death and his forces are gathering around, and they demand that you surrender everything, and they clamor for your overthrow, and they throw their skeleton arms in the window, and with their iron fists they beat against the door, and while you are trying to keep them out you see the torches of judgment kindling, and every forest is a torch, and every mountain a torch, and every sea a torch, and while the Alps, and Pyrenees, and Himalayas turn into a live coal, blown redder and redder by the whirl-wind breath of a God omnipotent, what will become of your refuge of lies?

"But," says some one, "you are engaged in a very mean business, driving us from tower to tower." Oh, no! I want to tell you of a Gibraltar that never has been and never will be taken: of a wall that no Satanic assault can scale; of a bulwark that the judgment earthquakes cannot budge. The Bible refers to it when it says: "In God is thy refuge, and underneath thee are the everlasting arms." Oh! fling yourself into it. Tread down unceremoniously everything that intercepts you. Wedge your way there. There are enough hounds of death and peril after you to make you hurry. Many a man has perished just outside the tower, with his foot on the step, with his hand on the latch. Oh! get inside. Not one surplus second have you to spare. Quick, quick, quick!

Glad Tidings by Rail.

Gospel Services Conducted in Outlying Districts by Preachers in Railroad Cars.

FROM Missionary C. H. Rust, who is laboring in Minnesota, under the auspices of the Baptist Publication Society, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a photograph of an audience in the Gospel Car "Glad Tidings," which is reproduced on this page. The Society has now four cars engaged in its service and the reports from each of them show that God is using this agency and blessing it to the salvation of souls. The cars are respectively named "Evangel," "Emmanuel," "Good Will" and "Glad Tidings." The first named travels chiefly in the South, the second on the Pacific coast, the third in the South-west and the last in the North-west.

The method adopted, as explained by Mr. Rust, is to send word to a town that the car will arrive there on a certain day and that one or more services will be held. The station agent is notified that it is desired to move the car on that day and he has it attached to the proper train. The railroad companies in Minnesota make no charge for this service and render every assistance that is asked of them, freely. On the arrival of the car at its destination, it is detached from the train and switched to a siding. Usually the stop is made at some isolated place, where there is no church or one in a struggling condition needing revival. By the time announced for the first service people come from all directions attracted by the rare privilege of hearing music, singing and preaching. Mr. Rust says he has known people to walk a distance of nine miles to attend a service in his car, and sometimes they will drive forty miles to be there. Instances have occurred of this kind, where the hearers have not been in any religious service for several years, the country being too sparsely settled as yet to support a church. Sometimes the car stops at a station, where nothing is to be seen in the great ocean of prairie, but a grain-elevator, the house of the section-boss, half a dozen other houses and, perhaps, a blacksmith's shop. Some thirty or forty persons comprise the total population of the village. But it is the centre of a wide section of country and the notice sent on before suffices to bring in people from more or less distant farms. A congregation of a hundred is not at all uncommon at such places. In the winter time the service is held in the car, which is fitted up for the purpose. The service is of the simplest character. The old Gospel story is told with all the earnestness and force the preacher can put into it, and frequently the Holy Spirit brings souls into the light then and there. Mr. Rust mentions one instance in North Dakota of a young man who came to the car making one of a congregation of fifty people. He paid close attention to the sermon and when at the close the preacher asked if there were not some willing to renounce sin and trust in Christ for strength to lead a godly life, the young man rose and said he should like to do so. He was taken into the forward part of the car and prayer was offered for him. Some conversation followed, in which some of his difficulties were removed and the way of salvation personally explained to him. He was encouraged to pray for himself and before the car started away, he was rejoicing in newly found faith and peace in Christ. Some months afterward a letter was received from him reporting his progress and describing the change in his life and character. Incidents of this kind are continually occurring and the results on the neighborhood are widely felt. Whenever it is possible the missionary tries to arrange for the organization of a Sunday School and a regular prayer-meeting to keep alive the interest aroused during the stay of the car.

Mr. Rust and his devoted wife have spent now fifteen months in this work and they are deeply thankful for the success that has attended their labors. They make their home in the car. It is nearly eighty feet long, and a space ten feet long is partitioned off for living accommodation. Sitting-room, bed-room and kitchen are provided at that end, and in other parts of the car, drawers, cupboards and other conveniences are ingeniously arranged to add to the comfort of its permanent inmates. Although the thermometer often registers forty below zero outside, there is no difficulty in keeping the car warm, and Mr. Rust speaks cheerfully of the comforts of this novel habitation. The cordial welcome they receive in almost every place the car stops at, adds to the delights of the life. But the chief pleasure comes from the blessing that has resulted from their labors. Beside the conversions that have taken place, much good has been done by words of kindly counsel and encouragement given to some Christians, who in loneliness and under difficult circumstances have been trying to live consistent lives.

A Missionary Martyr.

A very pathetic coincidence is related in the biography of Rev. J. D. Gordon of the New Hebrides. In March, 1872, he was making a translation of the New Testament in his little home in Erromanga. He had reached the Acts and was writing the story of the death of Stephen, and had just written in the native language the dying words of the first martyr, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge," when he was informed that some men were waiting to see him. He went out and saw a number of men with menacing aspect standing around the house. They belonged to a village where a loathsome disease was raging. The first sufferer had been to the missionary for advice. He, supposing that the disease was a simple eruption common in the island had given the man a lotion for it. But the disease was a horrible one, contracted from some vicious men belonging to the crew of a European trading steamer, which had been a few weeks at the island. The missionary did not recognize it when he treated the sufferer. His lotion did him no harm, but it was powerless to arrest the disease, and it spread in virulent form, and many others caught it. They had come to the conclusion that it was Mr. Gordon's lotion that had made them so ill. He tried to explain to them that it was due to their own wickedness, but they would not listen to him. In a few minutes they had beaten him to death with their clubs. His mangled body was carried into the room where he had been writing a short hour before. There on his desk lay the manuscript ending with the words, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge."

A Happy Pair.

On Sunday evening, January 10th, a beautiful scene took place at the West End Baptist Church, Brooklyn, where special services are being held under the direction of Rev. R. W. MacCullough. A few days before, a young married lady had found peace through believing on Jesus Christ, and had just left the robing-room, after having been baptized, when her attention was called to her husband, a bright intelligent young man, who had just publicly accepted the Lord Jesus Christ as his Saviour, and immediately she made her way through the crowded pews to where her husband sat. The young man saw his wife coming, and with new-found joy in his heart, sprang to greet her, and as they saluted each other, he in recognition of her baptism, and she of his salvation, many eyes were moistened with tears.

The Sermon on the Mount.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 9. Luke 6: 41-49. Golden Text, Luke 6: 46. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AFTER one entire night, spent in prayer on a mountain, our beloved Lord had chosen from his disciples twelve whom he valued, apostles, (sent ones.) With them, a great multitude of his disciples, and also a great multitude of people which had been attracted to him, from Judea and Jerusalem, in the south, and from Tyre and Sidon, in the north, he came down from the mountain and stood in the plain. A great work of healing was done there by the simple coming in contact with him: "As many as touched him were healed." (Luke 6: 12-19.)

It was on this occasion that he delivered the sermon which is given in full in the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of Matthew. It was "the Gospel of the Kingdom," the doctrine of that newness of life which he came to teach and to live, and also to make possible for those to live who should yield all to him. His doctrine went and was an unspeakable advance on the teaching of the law of Moses. It must have startled some of his self-righteous self-important hearers who "despised the poor," (James 2: 2), the needy and the troubled, as "smitten of God and afflicted" (Isa. 43: 4), when Jesus declared them "blessed." The new doctrine of this new Teacher utterly subverted the prevalent ideas of men. The poor are to have the kingdom, the hungry to be filled, the weeping ones to laugh; and moreover the men that are hated, are to rejoice and be exceeding glad, because, by their very persecution, they prove themselves followers of the prophets who were also persecuted by the great ones of their day! And then the rich, who expect to be regarded with esteem, for the vulgar reason that they have more possessions than the poor, are to learn that they have already had their portion; those who are full now shall hunger, and they that laugh now shall mourn and weep. And as though this were not strong enough, the great Author and Teacher fell with one blow the great popular idol—love of admiration: "Woe unto you when all men speak well of you! For in the same manner did their fathers to the false prophets."

Hitherto Jesus had spoken to his disciples, but it was in the presence of the multitude, now he addresses them under another category: "You which hear." "A true disciple is a 'hearing one.'" He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." (Rev. 2: 3.) But there are many of Christ's disciples who can teach, but who cannot hear. Let us not forget that the overcomers in the churches are those who have an ear to hear, and which do "hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Again the Lord pursues a teaching which is subversive of all claims that there is good in human nature, or that the child of God can stand upon either his merits or his rights: "I say unto you who hear, Love your enemies!" while they are enemies, without waiting till they deserve it: "do good to them that hate you," without waiting for them to repent; "bless them that curse you, pray for them that spitefully use you," for the simple reason that love is the law, and you follow him. This is the Lord's teaching; where are examples of such lives to be found as carry out, day by day, and hour by hour, such principles as these? Thank God there are such, but they are the exceptions in the church and unknown in the world. And yet it is only to him that overcometh as he overcame, to

Again, the principle of Christlike non-resistance—who practises it? Who is there that, if he is smitten on the one cheek, meekly turns the other, and when robbed of his cloak, lets his coat go after it? Who is there that gives something,—attention and prayer at least to everyone that asketh, and who also, when robbed, does not ask his goods again? This is not unsound fanaticism or selfish legality; Christlike love to those who sin against us makes us esteem the things we have lost by them as nothing in comparison with the soul of him who wrongs us? God is love, he is our Father, and his true children will have their Father's character. "If ye love them which love you what thank [literally grace] have ye? And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what grace have ye? And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what grace have ye? even sinners lend to sinners to receive again as much." (R.V.) There is no divine love, no "grace" in demanding equality or simple justice. This is "grace" if a man for conscience toward God endure grief suffering wrongfully (I. Pet. 2: 19), considering not his rights but his mission to follow in the newness of life of his great Master.

"But love your enemies, and do good and lend, hoping for nothing again [margin R.V. despairing of no man], and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be sons of the Most High: for he is kind to the unthankful and evil." It is a stupendous task which our Lord has undertaken. Not only is he come to "justify many for he shall bear their iniquities," (Isa. 53: 11), but also to make them partakers that escape the corruption which is in the world through lust "partakers of the Divine nature," (II. Pet. 1: 4), that they may be united to him in the closest oneness, and may love their enemies with his own love wherewith he loved us when we were enemies. Human love always contains a selfish element, it must have some return, it is not self-existent; it dies under ingratitude, coldness, injustice, indifference; but the love of Christ flourishes all the more where it meets with all this. Putting self out of the question, the impossible becomes easy; and that which our selfish human hearts could not do, the divine nature, Christ's love in us, can do without difficulty. Thus Stephen prayed for his murderers as his Lord before him. "The disciple is not above his Master, but every one when he is perfected shall be as his Master;" there is no other perfection than uniformity to Jesus Christ. All which is real can Stand a Test;

"If the blind guide the blind," the proof of the blindness will be the fall of both into the first ditch they attempt to cross; the proof of power to discover a mote in a brother's eye is the quickness of conscience which discovers the beam in our own eye. If our sight is not good enough to detect that, we are not in any way fitted to perform our operation upon our brother's eye. It is always those who are most quick to discover anything that is not of Christ in themselves, who are the most reluctant to correct or to judge a brother. Harsh judgment of others is generally a sign of little growth in uniformity to Christ. The ripened Christian waits for his Master to send him before he ventures to judge a brother, and then he approaches him in the presence and in the Spirit of God.

All which is genuine increases in value by every test to which it is put. The proof of a fruit tree is, not the blossoms, but the fruit which it bears; it must bear fruit which is of its own nature. Self bears selfishness, self-importance, self-pity, self-love, self-justification, self-unconsciousness, retaliation, etc., etc. Christ bears self-emptying, self-renunciation, humility, obedience, love to enemies and no retaliation. Where therefore, one of the trees in the Lord's garden bears the former kind of fruit, no amount of good or orthodox teaching which such a one may hold can hide the fact that self must be there to bring forth the fruit of self. And where the latter characteristics are to be found, it is impossible not to recognize Christ in the life which is Christ's like: the tree is known by its fruit. The cold of winter and the heat of summer, the breezes of spring and the dews of autumn, do not make thorns bring forth figs, nor a bramble bush grapes; they only go to make the tree bring forth "fruit after its kind."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

JEALOUSY of Christ's power and influence with the people was exhibited by the religious teachers of the day, early in his ministry.

The best of them were conscious that a reform was needed, that religion had lost its power with the masses and had become a mere dry husk of formalism; but the reform they wanted was on the old, established lines. If the new Teacher could lead the people to a stricter observance of the law, a more careful attention to ceremonies and the time-honored customs of religion, he would be doing a great work. But they doubted whether he would do so. There was a laxity about his own conduct that awakened uneasiness. Some of his cures had been done on the Sabbath, which, in their eyes, was a very doubtful proceeding. Then he had shown a liking for the society of people who were not respectable, associating openly with them and going to their feasts, while a reformer was naturally expected to be an ascetic. After all, in spite of his good qualities, and his really wonderful works, they knew that up to a year before this time, he was a common working-man. They were anxious that he should define his attitude toward the existing religious institutions, that they might know on what lines he proposed to proceed. Christ took an opportunity of doing this.

His mission, he tells them, is not one of destruction, but of development. Like the child in the kinder-garten school, they are now to learn the meaning of the picture teaching of the past. The rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic dispensation were not an end in themselves; they had a meaning which it was time was understood. The time of blossom was past and the time for fruit had come. The old dispensation was to disappear, not because it had proved useless, but because the new era for which it had been a preparation had arrived. He was not sent to destroy, but to fulfil. Thus, as is seen more clearly in Matthew's fuller report of the sermon, the Mosaic commandments and the revered maxims of the old teachers, are the bases of higher attainment. Thou shalt not kill, becomes thou shalt not feel angry, and other commands lose their power by a more radical injunction that goes deeper than prohibition of the overt act. Even the form of injunction is changed, as befits the higher grade of the learner. The Ten Commandments become to blessings. Do you wish higher attainment? This is the way to it: Blessed are the meek, the peacemakers, the poor spirit, the pure in heart, and in each case there is a special and peculiar blessing. It is not wealth, nor social distinction, nor talent, nor gifts, nor even religious observance, that raises a man in Christ's esteem—it is character. Good works? Yes truly, but good works proceeding naturally from a man who is good at heart, not from a bad man anxious to win popular applause or to win heaven for himself. He does not ask men to restrain the evil in their natures, but to have it eradicated. By and bye men will ask him how this is to be done and he will tell them of faith in himself, of the atonement, of the Holy Spirit, and of how men may obtain this goodness which fits them for his kingdom. But the present this is enough. All men may know now what are his principles. No religion of ease and laxity and compromise is this, but one that goes back of ceremonies and of conduct, down to the very springs of human nature and applies a touch to the heart.

Every tree is known by its fruit. To a man who was arguing that good works were not important, if a man had faith, I. Maclaren replied: "If you had in your garden a tree that for ten years, through summer and winter, sunshine and cloud, rain and snow has never put out a shoot or a leaf, would you not think that the tree was dead?"

The mote that is in thy brother's eye. Contrary to Christ's law to dwell on defects and failings of our brethren. The story is told of Alexander the Great, when he commissioned a painter to paint his portrait, the painter was concerned about an ugly scar which disfigured the side of the great monarch's face. He could not bring himself to paint the face with the scar for then the portrait would not be faithful; but he posed the king with the scar turned away from the spectator, and bade him lean on his elbow, and put his forefinger on his forehead in an attitude of meditation, thus covering the disfigurement completely. When a Christian speaks of a brother, he should not speak chiefly of the mote in his eye, as if that were the most conspicuous feature of his character.

The foundation on a rock. The contrast between the two men does not appear clearly in our version. The man who built on the earth built on the loose soil of the top of the rock, the kind of soil which would be washed away by a freshet. But houses were on the rock, but only one man carried his foundations into the rock; the other was a mere surface affair. Two of two hearers of Christ, the one who's content with hearing and did not put what he heard in practice was like the man who did not dig deep enough. He would be liable to be carried away by persecution or ridicule. A minister staying a night in a mountain district in Wales came to breakfast with a pale face. He said: "What a dreadful night it has been! I could not sleep all night. The wind and rain kept me awake. I thought the house would surely be washed away." His host said: "You would not have had such thoughts," he said, "if you had seen my house built, as I did. The storm never keeps me awake. I know I am safe on the foundations of the house, go right down into the solid rock."

Then shall thou see clearly. It is not for any one, and for those about him, whose gaze is attracted to the failings of others. Lord Byron used to say that he could always tell whether any man was a gentleman when he was introduced to him. If he had a mean soul his eye would be sure to travel down to the poet's foot in a few minutes. Byron had a club foot which every one knew, but a man of noble soul would be careful not to look at that. There is an old legend that Jesus approached a certain city saw a group gathered about the body of a dead dog. A halter was about the dog's neck and it was covered with mud. "Look at his ugly ears," said one. "Look at his torn hide," said another. "What a miserable tail he has!" said a third. Jesus looked on the poor beast and said, "Pearls are not equal to the whiteness of his teeth." He could see something to commend even in that repulsive spectacle. That is only a legend, but it is true that he sees in every man, no matter how degraded, qualities which he can use in his service if the man will yield himself to him to be regenerated.

LIFE IN SUNNY ANGOLA.

one of the Finest of African States, yet Cursed by Slavery and Superstition—Mission Work among the Angolans.

THE CITY AND BAY OF LOANDA, WEST AFRICA.

Few sections of Africa have a stronger attraction for the student of semi-savage conditions of life than Angola on the West Coast of Africa. It is the largest Portuguese province in Africa, with an area of about 1,000,000 square miles. All its people belong to the Bantu-speaking race. The province is divided into four districts, namely: Congo, Loanda, Benguella and Mossamedes. The districts of Congo and Loanda correspond to the two ancient kingdoms of the same names, and Benguella and Mossamedes to the ancient kingdom of Benguella. Loanda, the capital of the province, is the residence of the Governor-General. It has a population of 20,000, including about 3,000 whites, many of whom are convicts. Besides the population of Angola stock, there is a large native town of Congo people. Loanda is a very old city, having been founded at the close of the sixteenth century. Our photographic view of Loanda gives the lower town as seen from the Governor's palace. This part of its town is occupied by business houses, the upper town being the residences of functionaries and well-to-do traders. As a nation, the Angolans embrace several tribes, chief among which are the Kissama, Lubolo, Congo, Mbaka, and Ngola. The tribes all speak dialects of Kimbundu, the general language of Angola.

On the first page of this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is a colored illustration of more than usual interest. It portrays a native African concert in a village of the Mbaka district. Three artists play the marimba, which is the African piano, and another on the right, plays a drum, on which he is for the moment seated. In the background, leaning against the house, are some natives of the Angolan tribes, with their hair plaited in Egyptian fashion. The marimba is constructed of a series of gourds, the shells of which have been hollowed out and dried by exposure to the sun. These gourds (a vegetable growth, not unlike a squash or elongated pumpkin in appearance), are chosen of graduated sizes and ranged along a frame, after the manner of a xylophone, the smallest gourd to the right, and the largest to the left. The player strikes them sharply with a wooden mallet or drum-stick, and they give out a peculiar, yet not unpleasant sound. Some marimba players are very clever. The Mbaka tribe is semi-civilized, and its members are remarkably intelligent. In the last century, they were brought to some extent by Jesuit missionaries, and after the expulsion of these, the natives continued to teach one another without the help of white people. At present there are thousands of them who can at least sign their names. They are found scattered between the Malange and the Lualaba rivers. Livingston, the famous explorer, had noticed the great advantage which this knowledge of reading offered for missionary enterprise and greatly regretted that the Bible had not been given to this people in their own language.

Angola has been for many years past an attractive field for missionary work. Various Protestant denominations are represented in this part of the Dark Continent, including the British and Foreign Bible Society (which has a depot at Pongo Ar-dongo), the American Methodist Episcopal Church and the American Board of Foreign Missions. One of the best known workers in the field, combining both secular and sacred instruction, has been Heli Chatelain, whose name as explorer, traveler, and ethnologist is perhaps more widely known than that of any other African missionary since the days of Livingston. Mr. Chatelain (whose portrait appears on this page, has an interesting and eventful history. He was born at Morat, Switzerland, April 29, 1859. Much of his youth was passlected material for a primer, grammar, and a vocabulary of the Kimbundu language. This primer, the grammar and the Gospel of St. John were published in 1888 and 1889, during Mr. Chatelain's furlough in Switzerland. Since then he has gone twice to Loanda in 1889 as philologist of the United States Encyclopedia Expedition to West Africa, and again in 1891 as United States Commercial Agent. In 1893 he published a column of "Folk-tales of Angola," and more recently a series of Bantu notes and vocabularies.

During the travels up and down the West Coast and the interior of Angola, Mr. Chatelain has had opportunities to see the workings of the slave-trade, and the terrible evils of native slavery, and to investigate the nefarious system of contract labor. Natives, who had been kidnapped or were unjustly held in slavery, have often appealed to him to secure their liberty, but being unsupported by any society at home, Mr. Chatelain could do nothing but give them words of comfort.

His continued labor in Africa undermined his health and he was compelled again to seek recuperation and rest among his native mountains in Switzerland, where he spent nearly two years in a protracted convalescence following a severe sickness. It was while thus secluded from the world that he formed a resolution to found a society for the relief of the African slaves. His plan was to establish colonies or settlements where liberated or fugitive and runaway slaves would be received and trained. Under the Treaty of Brussels the great Powers decreed the abolition of African slavery, but the evil still exists with the knowledge and tacit permission of the English, French and Portuguese officials in Africa. Mr. Chatelain has already made considerable progress in the preparatory arrangements for his proposed colonies, and believes that large concessions of land in a salubrious district can be secured from the Portuguese and other governments, signatories to the Berlin Treaty, for the founding of the proposed settlements.

During his stay in Switzerland and while still weak from his African labors, Mr. Chatelain had a singular experience which has lately produced unforeseen results. He sat on the porch of his sister's home, overlooking the beautiful Lake Lemman. Suddenly the scene before him seemed to change and the lake and mountains assumed new forms. In a valley at his feet he saw once more the fields of Angola, and out and beyond, was the great Atlantic Ocean. The valley was teeming with life;

Mr. Chatelain, on returning to America, at once prepared to convert his vision to a reality. He had already been translating many of the Scriptures into the Kimbundu tongue, notably the Gospels of Luke and John, and a portion of the Acts. He now conceived the idea of a publication, in the native Kimbundu tongue, which would present in the simplest form intelligible to the native mind, portions of the Old and New Testaments. Under the auspices of the British and Foreign Bible Society, he has lately issued the first number of a bright little four-page publication, bearing the title suggested in his dream, Kamba dia Ngola ("The Friend of Angola").

HELI CHATELAIN

(Missionary, Explorer and Philologist.)

It contains a few of the Old Testament narratives, notably that of the Creation, which has the title: Dilunda dia dimatekeni dia xi ni dilu ni ima toso ("The tradition of Creation, and the beginning of earth and heaven and all things"). Next are told in letter and picture, clear to the primitive mind, the story of Kalunga ("the sea"), mbeji ("the moon"), iama and mutu, the wild and the tame beasts and of man. He also relates the story of his wonderful dream in the form of a musoso (folk-tale). The Friend of Angola also contains some of the peculiar proverbs of the country, which are specially interesting. Among them are these:

The elephant does not feel the weight of his trunk; so a mother does not notice the weight of her child. He who does not lean against his mother shall be caught by trouble.

Love is born; it is not named (meaning that it is spontaneous.)

The love of a mother no child can resist.

The parent may blacken his or her face, but cannot blacken her heart.

As thy mother does to thee, so the mother of another will not do to thee.

The twenty-third Psalm is thus rendered in Kimbundu:

Ngana Nzambi kabila kami (mubidi uami)

Ngeniami ni kubindama.

U ngi nikesa bu bouga ia uisu;

U ngi disa bu ngiti jatululuka.

Uikutisa muxima uami:

U ng' endesa mu njila jaela (jaiuka),

Mu konda dia jina die.

And so on to the end of the Psalm, the language being liquid and graceful, with many pleasant vowel sounds. Doubtless The Friend of Angola will be welcomed by the natives and will be very widely read and productive of much good among them. Mr. Chatelain contemplates soon returning to his old field of labor and devoting the remainder of his life to the training and educating of the liberated slaves, and also to work among the Angolans, whose cause lies very near to his heart.

Among the illustrations on this page, not the least interesting is that which represents "a horseback ride," Angola fashion. The rider in the present instance is a native princeling, the eldest son of a petty chief or king (there are many kings of small degree in Africa), who came thus mounted in state, invested with plenipotentiary powers to conduct some negotiation with a neighboring ruler. This style of mount, known familiarly elsewhere as "pick-a-back," is quite seriously regarded in Angola as dignified and graceful, and is in use among interior tribes where horses are unknown. Another photograph shows a fishing village, with the occupants engaged in the work of mending their nets. Fine palm trees are found all over the province, and add a picturesque quality to the scene.

ed on a sick bed, where he became a passionate reader. Naturally endowed with linguistic gifts, in the solitude of his sick-room, he acquired a mastery of many of the European languages. On his conversion, which took place while he was still a very young man, he resolved to devote his talents to the missionary cause, and his first earnings he saved with a view to paying his way to Africa. He came to America in 1883, and embarked for Africa as the linguist of Bishop Taylor's self-supporting missions in January, 1885. He labored earnestly for three years at Loanda, and then entered Malange, where he founded self-supporting schools, and col-countless numbers of the dusky-skinned natives moved hither and thither, as if without a leader. Above all, he seemed to hear a voice, as if some angel hovering near had spoken to him, and the voice bade him, as "the Friend of Angola," give the Gospel to those poor creatures in their own tongue. Presently the multitudes in the valley cast their eyes upward to where he sat and supplemented in dumb but eloquent petition the command of the angel. Soon the strange picture faded and he then knew that it had been but the dream of a moment; yet as though divinely directed, it had clearly pointed out to him his duty toward the people of distant Angola.

Ferd and Phil, Bootblacks.

HE firm of Ferd and Phil started in business down in Nassau street, where bootblacks and newsboys drive a thriving trade. Ferd was the senior partner, and he had the most to do with the money he made, for, one cold January day, he had adopted an old lady.

I never, for my part, could see why a fragile old lady is not as real an object of sympathy in the world as an orphan child, and as nice and helpless a being to adopt. Ferd had been championing Mrs. Allers a long time, defending her apple-stand from thievish boys, and helping her carry home her things at night. A rough untaught lad, Ferd Baxter was still a gallant knight, and Mrs. Allers, a widow, old, and all by her lone self, clung to him very fondly for his goodness. She it was who kept his clothes neat and whole, washed and mended for him, and cooked the food he bought, over her own handful of fire. Ferd had nobody belonging to him, his parents having disappeared or died while he was still very small, and he had grown-up anyhow and anywhere, sleeping under archways and in boxes, familiar with the last policeman's order to move on, picking up a living as best he could, but, notwithstanding all that was against him, this boy had kept honest, and clean of life, with a big tender heart under his rudeness of speech. Phil was a youngster who had seen hard times, too, but he had a mother, and father, and brothers, and sisters at home. The two boys were friends and partners, and dealt with one another on the square, and very fairly, though they were no higher in the social scale than bootblacks. From beginnings as humble, men of talent and force have risen to positions of eminence. "Seest thou a man diligent in his business, he shall stand before kings, he shall not stand before mean men," is a word of the Lord fulfilled to most, I may say, to all who believe in God, and obey his commandments.

Phil came rushing to Ferd, one bleak late afternoon, just when the crowds of home-going men were thickest. "Hurry up!" he said, "Old Mother Allers is in a faint, and they are going to carry her off to the hospital." Ferd fairly flew to his friend. He found her white and trembling, but out of her swoon, and much opposed to being carried to any place but her own small bit of a home. She declared herself able to walk, and, so leaning on Ferd, she proved to be, Phil and the other boys gathering up her little stock, and the procession in the deepening dusk gravely marching to the rear court where Mrs. Allers had

But the cold and the sleet had sapped the old lady's strength. She was not able to leave her bed the next morning, and when the City Missionary came to see her, she found the poor woman but the wreck of her former self.

"I am not in need," she protested, "I've a boy who looks out for me, Ferd, the bootblack; you may know him."

"I have no doubt," said the visitor, "that you are a very good woman, but I am not sure that you are the mother of a boy who looks out for you. If that is Ferd, I will see him."

So she went to see Ferd, and offered to assist in the care of his protegee. But Ferd said "no."

"I've taken her on my own back, as if she was my mother," he said, "and I'll look after her myself as long as I've two hands and two feet."

One day there came a deputation of young people from an uptown church, to do what they could in scattering sunshine in the courts and alleys, which are misnamed the slums. I wish they were not called by this name. I do not find that my friends, and I have some whom I love who live in these streets of poverty, like being spoken of as residents of slums, nor do I feel that accidents of birth or station or worldly goods should ever allow one person to patronize another. There is a note of patronage in the speech of the avenue when it talks about the slums, and when it goes "slumming."

But these were very dear and lovely young people, and when they knocked at Mrs. Allers' door, and she invited them in, the old apple-woman's carriage had a simple dignity which would not have been unbefitting a queen, and the visitors recognized it, and behaved with equal courtesy. They told Mrs. Allers that knowing her to be shut in from church and prayer-meeting, they had thought she might like to hear them sing, and one, with a voice like an angel, lifted her silvery solo, and the others joined in the chorus.

In the midst of it entered Ferd, with Phil at his back. The leader among the young men, noticed the sturdy and independent bearing of the boys, and the kind manner of Ferd to his old friend. When the party left, this gentleman said, "We are in want of a boy in our office, and that older one looks as if he were bright and capable; he ought to have a helping hand, and I'll look into his antecedents, and give him one if I can."

So it came about that the partnership of Ferd and Phil was dissolved, Ferd finding a good opening in a wholesale house, where there is a chance for him to work his way up. Phil still pursues his useful calling, but the door out of it will soon open for him, as I happen to know.

Mrs. Allers is feeble, but she can use her hands, and the girls who came to sing to her have seen to it that she has a chance to dispose of all the bright red mittens she can knit. It is a contented little home to which Ferd goes every night, and love reigns there. Better is a dinner of herbs, or of salt pork and cabbage, where love is, than a splendid banquet, and hatred therewith.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The Title "Pharaoh."

Many readers of Scripture are puzzled to know why all the kings of Egypt are called Pharaoh, only three of them, Necho, Shishak, and Hophrah being known by any other name in the Bible. The meaning of the word, and its use by the Egyptians as a title, are explained by Brugsch Bey in the following passage from his "Egypt under the Pharaohs":

"The Memphis tombs tell much concerning the customs of Pharaoh and his court. The sovereign bears the official title of 'King of the Upper and Lower Country'; he is also called Perao, 'the great house,' better known, perhaps, under the Hebrew equivalent of Pharaoh. The people honored him as 'lord' (neb) and 'god' (neter). At sight of him every native prostrated himself and touched the ground with his nose, and it was an especial favor if the command of his lord permitted him to kiss his knee."

It seems, that the Hebrews adopted one of the current Egyptian titles of the king as their official name for him, spelling and pronouncing to the idiom of their own tongue. While all of these kings had each his own personal name, it was not common, even in Egypt, to use in speaking of him, the more complimentary titles being preferred. We have similar usages in modern times. For instance, it is very rarely that we see the name Abdul Hamid applied to the present ruler of Turkey; or Alexander applied to the ruler of Russia. Instead of this we almost uniformly speak of the one as the Czar and the other as the Sultan. In reality, our English Bibles ought to read, in every instance, instead of Pharaoh, the Pharaoh; for then the title, as in the cases of the Czar and the Sultan, would not be taken by the uninformed reader as a personal name.

Children of Light.

How the World is Helped by Them and How the Title may be Won.

BY DR. ALEXANDER MACLEOD.

OD has beautiful names for his children: Daughters of Jerusalem, Sons of Zion, Children of Abraham, Children of the Bride-chamber, Children of the Kingdom, Morning Stars, and Children of Light.

I have a great love for the last of these. The most beautiful thing in the world is light. And it is like covering a child with a robe of light to make light a part of the name.

There is one thing in the names given by God which is different from names given by us. The name points to something like itself in the soul. When therefore he calls his sons and daughters "Children of Light," it is because, in one way or other, they have light and the love of light in their souls.

In a most delightful book I once read,—the author mentions a very interesting fact about birds and light:—

Birds are very fond of catching the last evening rays of a winter's sun, and are always to be found in the afternoon on banks facing the west, or swinging, if there is no wind, on the topmost branch of the small fir tree. On the mountains, too, all birds, as the sun gets low, take to the slopes to face the west; whilst in the morning they betake themselves to the eastern banks and slopes to meet his rays. No bird is to be found in the shade during winter, unless it has flown there for shelter from some imminent danger.

This is very remarkable in the case of the golden plovers, who in the evening ascend from slope to slope, as each becomes shaded by the intervening heights, until they are all collected on the very last ridge which the sun shines upon.

Now it seems to me, that God's children resemble birds in this love of light;—only, the light which they love is the light of goodness and truth and righteousness, which comes from Christ.

In the whole world there are just two kinds of children:—children of light and children of darkness. If we could open God's book, and turn to the names of the children, we should find the good children marked as "children of light," and the bad children as "children of darkness."

It would make me very happy if I knew that all the children who read this were "children of light." Your parents, your teachers, and all who love you would be happy to know it. You would be happy yourselves.

And where is the boy or girl who would not wish to have that beautiful name? I want to help you not only to wish, but to pray and strive for it. I believe that every one of you may have it.

Every child who would become a child of light must resemble the light; must be what light is, and do what light does.

I am going to show you that a child of light is just a child who is like the light. The things true of light are true of the child of light. And, therefore, to know what sort of children "children of light" are, we must search out the good things in light itself. The same good things are in the "children of light."

You all know something about light. The house we live in is full of light, it is streaming in through the windows and showing you the faces around you and the words on your book. Now light is a likeness of God. You never saw God himself. Nobody has. But God sends us likenesses of himself every day. Light is a likeness of him. The light of the fire is one likeness. The light of the lamp is another. But the grandest of all is the light of the sun.

It is the same with children of light. They are pictures of God. When you see one of them you see an image of God.

Light is like God. The child of light also is like God.

When Jesus was a child he was a perfect child-picture of God. Looking at Jesus was the same as looking at God. Jesus himself said, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." He also said, "I am the light." He was the true, best light. He came from the place whence all light comes. He came to be to the soul of man what light is to the eye—a picture of God. He was the holiest, the truest, the most beautiful picture of God in heaven or earth.

I know that no child of earth can be so fair a picture of God as Jesus was; but also know that every child who resembles Jesus is as really a picture of God as he. God is light. His children are children of light. The child is like the Father, he loves what his Father loves, he hates what his Father hates. There is truth in God: that very truth is in his child. There is holiness in God: that very holiness is in his child. There is righteousness in God: that very righteousness is in his child. Looking at the child you are looking at a picture of the Father. And therefore all who are like God, all who are good like him, and holy like him, are children of light.

In this they resemble the child Jesus too. They are pictures of God. Their being so makes men think of God. And down here upon earth, and up there in heaven, they have the beautiful name. This is one mark of the child of light.

A second thing in light we were to look at is, that it chases away darkness. The second good also we find in children of light.

Light cannot endure darkness. When it meets with darkness it strikes into it and chases it away.

You have seen this yourselves. Perhaps you have awakened some night out of sleep and found the room filled with darkness. Your little brother is lying by your side. You can touch him with your hand. You can hear him breathing with your ears. But if you strain your eyes as much as you can, you will not see his face. If there turned towards your own on the same pillow, and you cannot see one bit of it. If at that moment, however, mamma or nurse should come into the room with light, with a very little lamp, this flame little though it be, would begin to chase away the darkness. It would reach over the bed, and lift the black shadow from your brother's face, and roll it away, until you could see the red on his cheeks, and the moving of his breast with the breathing you only heard before.

It is always the way with light. It will not live in the same room with darkness. It chases it away.

Now the child of light resembles light in this very thing. But I must explain to you before saying more, that there is worse darkness than the darkness which fills the room at night. It is the darkness of the kingdom of darkness. And the kingdom of darkness is just the kingdom of evil men and women. Bad deeds long to this kingdom, and bad thoughts and words. These are "the works of darkness" you read about in the Bible. A child of light cannot endure these works of darkness. The darkness which the child of light chases away is the darkness of sin. He abhors bad thoughts and words. He hates the darkness and sin of them, and tries to chase them away.

But only "children of light"—children who have the beautiful name—do this. There are people who love evil better than good, and darkness better than light. These people would not try to put the darkness of evil away. The bad, black deeds of an evil heart, the bad, black deeds of an evil life, are loved by such people. People of this kind are called in the Bible "children of darkness."

And always there is power in the children of light. The goodness which makes them children of light puts away badness in others. Always it has been so. Always it will be so. All the evil in the world shall yet be put out of it in the same way. God will make the goodness of his own children to shine so brightly in their lives that badness, like a great shadow, must disappear. And already, if you to whom I write are children of light, if in God's book you have the beautiful name, you are helping to chase away the evil which is in the world. Your are letting your light so shine, that others, seeing your good deeds, are putting away their badness and coming to God for light.

HAS GOD FORGOTTEN EDEN?

William Willard Howard Pictures the Ancient Garden as a Scene of Slaughter and Desolation—An Appeal to Christendom—Relief Work Progressing.

"And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the Garden in the cool of the day: And Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden."

"HAT was in the beginning of all things, when God had planted a garden eastward in Eden. In the same place today men and women are being themselves, not from the presence of God, but from the wrath and curse of devils.

REV. MR. COLE.

MRS. COLE.
(Bitlis.)

And the devils are not such as tempted Eve, but human fiends who bear the warrant and seal of the Sultan of Turkey.

In that place where God walked in the cool of the day, in that long ago time, now fiendish hords, enrolled as soldiers of Sultan Hamid, and bearing his name, hunt to death Armenian men, women, and children with a ferocity that has no parallel, save in the red history of the Ottoman empire. The place that God made holy with his presence, now runs red with the blood and resounds with the shrieks of anguish of men and women, whose only fault is that they follow Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

The Garden of Eden stands neglected of God. Is it also forgotten of God? The present inhabitants of the Garden of Eden would renounce Jesus of Nazareth and accept Mohammed of Medina, their troubles would vanish like the mists of morning. It is because they elect to be flowers of the Son of him who planted the Garden that they are hunted to the death like ravens. Are the true followers of the lowly Nazarene in Europe and America worthy of the name of Christian if they allow this unthinkable outrage to continue?

The reform and regeneration of Turkey are easily within the power of man. It is not a difficult thing for man to do. The occupation of Turkish Armenia by an armed force might be accomplished without the shedding of one drop of blood, for Turkey is in no condition to resist the combined action of the Christian powers of the world. Even one power alone would find it a hard one. Russia or England could easily occupy Armenia, and Turkey would be powerless to prevent it. America, the greatest Christian nation on earth, could earnestly urge that this should be done, and should stand ready to give material aid if occasion demanded it. America has no concern in the politics of the East, is true; but this is not a matter of politics. It is a matter of common humanity. It can be of little moment to America who occupies Turkey so long as that occupation is for the best interests of the inhabitants, the ties of blood and race and religion demand that we should urge the duty of occupation upon Great Britain. In this matter America should give England the most loyal and sincere support. The time of petty sectional jealousies has passed. England and America join hands in preaching the gospel and protecting Christians in all lands of the earth. The present emergency calls for instant action, lest the Christian race in Turkey be utterly annihilated.

Talking with an American missionary in Persia—a Doctor of Divinity and a learned and godly man—the conversation drifted to the Armenian question, and the missionary said: "I do hope that England and Russia will march into Turkey with an army and overturn the Turkish rule once and for all. That's the only solution of the Armenian question."

It has been my privilege to know personally fifty-two American missionaries in Turkey and Persia. I know of no more unselfish, godly men and women on this earth. They are giving their lives for the good of humanity, their only reward being the approbation of God and the approval of their own consciences. To the timid folks at home I will say that not one of those missionaries, man or woman, will in the slightest degree disapprove of the forcible occupation of Turkey by the troops of Great Britain. Every one would welcome with enthusiasm an armed occupation of Turkey as solving the Armenian question for all time to come.

Judging solely from its physical characteristics, the Garden of Eden was about the last place on earth that one would select as likely to have been favored of God above all others. I once asked an American missionary in Turkey why he supposed the Lord selected Eastern Turkey for the beginning of the human race, and he replied that he thought that it may have been for the purpose of making sure that the people would spread out over the rest of the world. If this had been the purpose, the place was well chosen, for man's natural impulse would be to get away to some more congenial place as quickly as possible. But the country may have been much different in the times of Adam and Noah. Mountains and hills that are now treeless, barren, and rocky, may have been covered with forests, rich grasses, and beds of wild flowers; plains that are now nearly as barren and useless as the desert, may have been pasture grounds for countless thousands of sheep and cattle; and valleys that now give a scanty harvest when laboriously cultivated and irrigated, may have blossomed with gardens and fields of grain. All the land roundabout may have been a veritable earthly paradise, as the Garden of Eden is described in the Bible, but, if so, the curse of God has fallen heavily upon it.

The city of Van is simply packed with refugees who have neither clothes nor food, and hundreds are arriving daily. The surgical department of the American mission at Van is taxed to its utmost capacity in the treatment of gunshot wounds and broken heads, while swarms of destitute and naked refugees crowd the mission grounds begging for a bit of bread in the name of Christ.

With money forwarded to her by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Dr. Grace W. Kimball is doing her best to feed the starving and clothe the naked, but many difficulties have come up to hinder the work of relief. She is ill with influenza, but still she bravely continues at her work of relief. Not only does she feed the hungry and clothe the naked, but she provides work for those who are able to work, and, in addition, treats the gunshot wounds and binds up the broken heads. She has the assistance of all of the missionaries at the station, but the brunt of the work falls on her own shoulders, and having been for many weeks the only physician and surgeon at the mission, her work has been doubly severe. Dr. Reynolds, the regular physician of the mission, has been absent for five months assisting in the distribution of the English relief fund in Sassoun, but that work has now been abandoned, owing to the hostility of the Turks, and the missionaries who were engaged in it are in constant peril of their lives. Dr. Reynolds has been very ill in Moush, but telegrams from him said that he had passed the crisis and expected to leave for Van on November 25.

The missionaries in Bitlis are practically prisoners in their own houses, as the feeling of the Turks is so bitter against them for giving food to the starving Armenians that they may not venture out of doors except at serious risk of being shot. They are now waiting for a favorable opportunity to escape to Van; but at present that is very much a case of out-of-frying-pan-into-fire.

The American mission work at Van has been suspended, and all the schools closed. The closing of the schools, however, has not been confined to the American mission, but has extended to every school in the city, of whatever race or creed. All the shops have likewise been closed, both Armenian and Turkish. Even the Turkish shop in the bazaar proper have been shut, so great is the fear of massacre. The Turkish government ordered the Armenian merchants to open their shops, and the Armenians obeyed, but when the shops were opened they were entirely empty, the goods having been removed to the merchants' houses. The merchants then sat in their empty stores with nothing to sell.

With the money already sent to her from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S relief fund, Miss Kimball has done a large work in the supplying of bread for the starving, and she is now at work on a soup kitchen. As I have already explained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, her plan of relief is to furnish work to such of the poor are unable to feed them, however willing they may be.

Any form of relief among the outlying villages is at present impossible. The roads are so haunted by murderous Kurds that no one can go two miles beyond the city of Van without being killed. The extermination of the Armenians, will go forward much more swiftly than by the old method of Sassoun, for where Sassoun lost its four thousand and its forty villages, the province of Van alone loses its fifty thousand and its 200 villages.

On this point I have lately talked with Armenians, Kurds, Persians, Turks and Europeans, and the opinion is unanimous that the policy now is to exterminate the Armenians by destroying their villages and thrusting them out destitute and starving among the snow-covered mountains. This is not theory: it is fact.

From the mountains of Kurdistan I have received word that the Kurds are preparing for the attack on Van. Warring tribes have proclaimed a truce for the time being among themselves. One chief has sent word to another chief: "When your men meet my men there must be no fighting. We must all join together for the harvest." It is likely that when the villages are all disposed of the entire force of Kurds will turn upon Van for the bloodiest massacre ever known in the red history of Turkey. It will probably be a fight that will remain a long time in the memory of man, for the Armenians are thirty-five thousand strong, and very many of them have excellent breech-loading rifles. In addition a great many determined revolutionists have entered Van during the past few weeks, all well armed and ready to fight.

The American mission grounds are out on the outskirts of the city in an exposed position, and it is rather doubtful whether the missionaries could keep the Kurdish wild beasts at bay. The grounds are so extensive that it would take a considerable force of men to make a successful defense against a horde of Kurds. The mission is under the protection of the British Government, but the Kurd cares nothing for it.

I have the names of 108 of the two hundred villages destroyed by the Hamidieh cavalry in the province of Van. I have no reliable information from the districts of Shadakh, Moks and Haigatzor, but most of the villages in those districts had been destroyed, and it is not likely that anything is left except the mud bricks of the houses. In the province of Bitlis things are in no better condition.

Are the Christian people of America willing that this thing shall continue?

WILLIAM WILLARD HOWARD.

Urumia, Persia. Dec. 8, 1895.

Among the recent contributions to the Relief Fund were two bracelets, a pair of earrings, a gold bar pin, an amethyst ring and a garnet ring. These were sent by unknown donors, who asked that they be sold and the proceeds applied to the Fund.

It is now announced that the Red Cross will proceed to Constantinople. On reaching that city, Miss Barton, the President, will apply to the Turkish government for permission to work in the Armenian field. It is not at all certain that the request will be granted. Meanwhile, the American Board missionaries, who are distributing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, are the only relief agents actually at work. A remittance from the Fund has just been sent to Palu, where (as stated in a letter in last week's issue), there is great suffering in consequence of the recent massacre.

Contributions to the Relief Fund during the week are acknowledged on page 94.

as are able to work. Business in Van and the province of Van has been dead for months. Nothing is being bought or sold except the simplest articles of food that will sustain life. Miss Kimball is, therefore, distributing these articles of clothing free to the wretched village refugees who are flocking to Van in rags and nakedness.

In raiding the villages the Hamidieh cavalry not only destroyed the houses, drove off the sheep and cattle and removed every portable piece of property, but actually stripped the villagers of the clothes on their backs. The unfortunate peasants, men, women and children, were thrust out into the wilderness of snow-covered mountains without clothes to cover them or food to eat. How many of these poor creatures left bloody tracks on snow and ice; how many dropped by the wayside to go down to death in a shroud of snow and a tomb of ice no man may know. The snow will not give up its dead for long months to come.

What is to become of these homeless and foodless I do not pretend to tell. They are absolutely without shelter from the cold and snow of winter; without food, without clothes, without friends. The Kurds have taken everything that they possessed on earth. The people of Van Washington Changes.

NOTHING ever impresses me at the national capital more mightily than that the honors of the world are transitory and unsatisfactory. Great men, I notice, at Washington, are great only a little while. The men I saw here in high places fifteen years ago are nearly all gone. One venerable man, seated in the Senate near the vice president's chair, was there since he was introduced as a page at ten years of age by Daniel Webster, but a short time ago was buried. A few years change the most of the occupants of high positions. Young men, put not your stress on the honors of this world. Look chiefly for the honors that come from God. They never fade; they never destroy. Crowns, thrones, sceptres, and dominions you may have for the asking.

The Navies of the World.

AT this time all nations are discussing the battle-ships. Never before were there so many floating batteries of death as now. What wonderful progress since the flat-bottomed galleys of Carthage crept along the coast, running into a creek or cove at the first sight of a squall, down to the founding of the British navy by Henry VII., with its large warship called the Great Harry, and the first English three-decker called the Sovereign of the Seas, down to the modern navy. Our American navy was born in 1775, when Congress equipped two new cruisers, the one of ten guns and the other of fourteen guns. I wish I could shake out the spectral canvas of some of those old ships of war, and sail them before you, crowded from stem to stern with patriotic memories. John Paul Jones, of Revolutionary memory, should first bring before us his battle-ships, the Alfred, the Providence, the Ranger and the Richard—with his answer for a call for surrender: "I haven't yet begun to fight!" and Commodore Decatur, with his gunboats, and the Alabama, and Old Ironsides, and the Constitution, that set the French frigate flying, should fall into line and the open port-holes would speak forth the deeds of men who were not afraid to die for their country.

Would that our navy and all the navies of the world were thus! What a commentary upon the unevangelized condition of the human race, that after 1895 Christmas stars have shone on our earthly nights we are still planning for more war ships and must have them if we are to maintain our place among nations. But I must now quit my pen and the trepidation that has lately been felt because of the smallness of our American navy as compared with foreign navies, and when we are told how the greater battle-ships of other nations might ride up somewhere near the Narrows and shell New York into ruins. Such alarmists must have forgotten the almost miraculous creation of an American navy in 1861 under Gideon Welles, the War Secretary. We had then here and there an old ship ready to fall to pieces at the sound of the first cannonade, and only about two hundred available seamen in all the naval stations and receiving ships. Yet orders were given to blockade twenty-five hundred miles of seacoast, greater than the whole coast of Europe. And beside that, the Ohio, Tennessee, Cumberland, Mississippi, and other great rivers, covering an extent of two thousand more miles, were to be patrolled. No wonder the whole civilized world burst into a guffaw of laughter at the seeming impossibility. But the work was done, done almost immediately, done thoroughly and done with a speed and consummate skill that eclipsed all the history of naval architecture. And foreign nations had not better now depend on our seeming unreadiness for self-defence. Better keep their ironclads on the other side the sea. Better not too confidently insult the Stars and Stripes, which mean more now than any day since they were first hoisted. What Gideon Welles did in the creation of our American navy in 1861, our Secretary Herbert would do better in 1896, and hundreds of craft that have never yet been heard of in our navy yards would suddenly take on an armament that would leave the foreign ships along our coasts a mass of crushed smokestacks and broken up decks and splintered rudders. But God grant that the last pound of powder has been burnt in the destruction of soldiers on the land or sailors on the sea. May the reign of peace and good-will be an everlasting reign.

Purified Politics.

THE time is coming when all the ballot boxes and all the political offices are to be brought under Christian influences. A religion that will not tell a man how to vote and how to act after he has voted, as well as how to pray, is no religion at all. The bloated fist of ruffianism, swinging around the head of the popular sovereign on election day, must give place to another spirit. I have no faith in the decision of an election started in a drunken caucus, and assessing its candidates in the back part of a grog shop. How, then, shall any political circles be purified? Will professional politicians do it? No. Will political orators do it? No—for the most part, no. I am stopped on my way up the street, during a caucus, at the Democratic headquarters, and I heard that all the Republicans were thieves! Then I stopped at the Republican headquarters, and I heard that all the Democrats were villains! So I made up my mind that neither of the political parties is able to report in regard to the other party.

Whence, then, shall come the healing, purifying, elevating influence? From the Word of God and the Spirit of God, and from no other source, and I call on the men who believe in the Bible and the coming of a judgment day, in which we must give an account for our votes as well as for our words and actions, to join in the crusade against the nefarious influences that are now abroad. The fine gentleman may exercise the right of suffrage, then go back to his beautiful parlor, or to his country house, and feel he is independent of political immorality. No, sir. You will feel it in your home, and will feel it in your business, and you ought to realize the fact that you have around you in your household those who shall be affected by the result of these elections. Your families and you will realize the fact that there are no innocent persons in the present and the future of public virtue, and that no man is independent of political morality. The influences are coming up like the frogs and lice of Egypt into your sleeping apartments and into your bread trays. The moral pestilence will taint all the air, and the malaria of the lowest wards in the city will touch the highest circles, and the wretch crawling out of the very sewer of the city to vote, will, with their muddy hands, bedaub the glove of the exquisite. Christian men have no right to lay aside their Christian robes of profession and say: "Lie there now until two months have passed and we have got through the election, and then I'll put you on again." A religion that is adjourned for two months of the year might as well be adjourned all the twelve months.

M. M. What is conscience?

It is an ethical faculty of the soul which enables us to form moral judgments and to distinguish accurately between right and wrong, good and evil. It is born with its possessor, but it is only developed as life proceeds. In the proper aspect, it is a divinely implanted monitor to guide us to right action, thought and living. It may, by a persistent life of sin and indifference, be dulled almost to the point of extinction.

Oh, may it live for years and years!

A. W. T. 1. What reason can there be for regarding the six days of creation as different from our days? 2. In what part of the year did Christ's birth occur?

1. That the rocks with the fossils indicate long periods of time prior to the appearance of human beings. They show a condition in which human beings could not have lived, and the fossils of animals have been found in the strata, such as were specially adapted to those conditions. They also indicate a gradual process of development and changes requiring enormous periods. By natural order such periods alone could explain the evidence, and it cannot be supposed that supernatural power was used to deceive. 2. Many theories have been advocated, but the balance of evidence appears to us to be in favor of December.

A. W. M., Wauchula, Fla. Was the experience of the final outcome described by Paul in Romans 7, 13-25, the experience of a converted man, or a reminiscence of a time before conversion?

The question is disputed by strong advocates on both sides. You must take our opinion for what it is worth. It appears to be the experience of a converted man striving after holiness. An unconverted man does not declare that he delights in the law of God, or that he undergoes a struggle between the two laws of the flesh and the spirit. The unconverted man seldom, if ever, finds such resistance to sin, such regret at not being able to serve God fully, as Paul says he experienced. The struggle begins at conversion, when the man tries to live a holy life, finds opposition within himself and despairs until (as in ver. 25), he realizes where his struggle lies.

Reader, Michigan O. 1. Is there any evidence apart from the Bible that there is a life after death? 2. If there is a life beyond the grave, shall we know our loved ones?

1. There are suggestions which are a basis for the belief but no evidence that can be regarded as positive proof. One such suggestion is now being investigated here and in Europe. It proceeds from observation of a power in the human mind to operate independently of the senses, as in dreams, and still more strikingly under hypnotic influence. It would seem to imply the possibility of continued existence without the body, and this is confirmed by the fact that often at the time of death, the spirit seems more vigorous and active when the physical nature is growing weaker. The argument from analogy, as in the case of the butterfly developing from the caterpillar, has also long been urged in spite of its defects, and it has encouraged many to hope. But there is no firm ground for confidence until you open the Bible, and there find that Christ distinctly assures men of immortality. It becomes a question of faith, and we believe there is abundant evidence of the faith being well-grounded. All that is revealed to us clearly points to the recognition of friends in the future life. If conscious existence, and existence in which the events of life are remembered. If events are remembered, it is reasonable to believe that the memory extends to persons, too. The soul preserves its identity, as we are led to expect, there is no room for doubt as to its recognition.

B. G., Philadelphia, Pa., writes:

A short time ago I read an article "Peace in Answer to Prayer," in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and it was of great interest. I well remember how those precious words comforted me when in the deepest sorrow. I had heard but a day or two before of the death of my only child, a son twenty-one years of age. He was away out in the far West, and it was impossible to have his remains brought home on account of the very heavy snow-storms. While sitting at the dinner table I heard a voice, or something to me, "Go to your Bible for comfort." I thought, "I would wait until after dinner, when again I heard the voice. I said, 'Lord, I will go now.' And having excused myself hurried to my room, and immediately opened my Bible at these precious words: 'But verily God hath heard me; he hath attended the voice of my prayer. Blessed be God, which hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me.' I said, 'These words the Lord hath given me, shall be a comfort to me and ever will be.' It is safe trust in Jesus.

Reader, Mount Vernon, Ia. Are the different denominations of Evangelical Christians a hindrance to the cause of Christ?

The division is a serious hindrance in the waste of funds involved in duplicating agencies of service. The cost of the various foreign and domestic missions might be reduced and better applied, if all the denominations would agree to work together. In some small towns, too, there are several small, struggling churches, each with its debt, and its staff underpaid, when there might be one strong church doing good work, well supported. On the other hand, men's minds are so different constituted that there would be little harm if they were included in one church. It would be a decided step in advance, and perhaps we can hope for at present, if the denominations could be induced to co-operate with each other in aggressive work. Dr. Strong of the Evangelical Alliance, recently suggested these columns a plan to effect this object.

J. S., Johnstown, O. Can a person who has cheated or defrauded another, in any way, hope to be admitted to heaven unless he has paid the wronged person principal and interest?

It is his duty to pay, but if he is unable to do so, his failure will not exclude him from heaven. God does not require the impossible. A man who repents of his sins and obtains God's forgiveness, will be anxious to atone to anyone whom he has wronged, and will do so to the full extent of his power; but, as you can see for yourself, he might die before he had succeeded in doing so, however anxious and earnest he might be in his endeavor. It would be a manifest injustice which God would never do, to exclude such a man. His intention and his effort are accounted as evidence of his conversion.

Reader, Vicksburg, Miss. Are conversion and sanctification the same thing?

As the words are generally used, there is a wide difference as between planting a growth in a tree. Conversion occurs when a person believes in Christ, and by the Holy Spirit's power turns from sin to serve God. New desires, new aims and emotions take possession of the soul, and strength is imparted to resist temptation. This change varies in different persons in intensity. Some are scarcely conscious of it, owing to its being a gradual process. With others it is sudden, and is reached only after severe anguish of mind. The change is the beginning of sanctification. A person is a member of Christ's kingdom, and the process of sanctification is to fit him for its duties and privileges. It consists, as the word implies, in making him holy, and the process is lifelong. Every year ought to show progress in his becoming more like Christ, bettering himself, and more useful in the world. The rate of progress in sanctification depends on the degree with which he yields to the power of the Holy Spirit.

To Investigate British Claims.

In selecting commissioners to investigate the rival claims of Great Britain and Venezuela, President Cleveland has displayed a spirit of fairness and discretion that does him credit. It is not an ideal commission, and some names were suggested for it which might have been more highly respected abroad than those of its members, but on the whole, the country approves of it, and will have confidence in its sagacity and impartiality. Mr. Cleveland wisely ignored the politicians in making his choice. No member of the Commission has achieved distinction by partisan political activity, and the affiliations of at least two of them have been with the party opposed to the President. Justice David J. Brewer is a member of the United States Supreme Court. He was appointed to that high position in 1889 by President Harrison. Prior to his appointment, he had served five years as Judge of the United States Circuit Court. He was born in 1837 in Smyrna, Asia Minor, where his father was a missionary. His mother was a sister of Cyrus and David Dudley Field. A second member of the Commission who has had a judicial experience is Richard H. Alvey, who is Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia. He is a native of Maryland, where he held high office in the State Appellate Court for about twenty years. He is said to have a thorough knowledge of the Spanish language, which will be useful to the Commission in the investigation. Dr. Andrew D. White, a third member of the Commission, is probably the only one whose name is known outside his own land. He has been United States Minister successfully to Germany and to Russia, and has written books which have been widely read in European lands. Dr. White is a native of New York. He was the first President of Cornell University, a position he held with credit for many years. President Grant recognized his high qualities by placing him on the Commission to San Domingo. Another eminent educator who has been appointed on the Commission is Daniel C. Gilman, President of Johns Hopkins University. He was Professor of Physical and Political Geography at Yale until 1875, when he resigned to become the first President of Johns Hopkins. The fifth Commissioner is Mr. Frederic R. Coudert, who was one of the counsel before the Behring Sea Commission. Mr. Coudert is a leader of the New York Bar, and has won distinction as an able and learned lawyer. The Commission appears to be made up of men specially qualified to examine the various aspects of the subject, and to weigh impartially the evidence which will be submitted to them. It may be hoped that the decision of the Commission will be unanimous, and be so equitable as to commend itself to all parties to the dispute. Patriotic citizens on both sides of the Atlantic, realizing what momentous issues hang on the decision, should pray that the Commissioners may each and all be endowed with that wisdom which was given to the men of Issachar, making them men that had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do. (1. Chron. 12: 32.)

On Treasure Island.
A San Francisco journal publishes the description of a remarkable colonizing settlement. It appears that some years ago a citizen of Stockton, Cal., obtained information that there was treasure buried on Cosos Island off the coast of Central America. It was said to have been buried there by pirates many years ago. He secured a concession from the Nicaraguan government to farm the whole island and with capital supplied by people who had faith in his information, he settled there. A number of workmen have joined him and have built houses and established a regular colony. They have a boat with which they can make journeys to the mainland for supplies and they have planted about four thousand coffee trees. The leader of the expedition writes that no treasure has been found as yet, but the island is certainly the one indicated by the old man from whom he obtained his information.

JUDGE RICHARD H. ALVEY. DR. ANDREW D. WHITE. JUSTICE DAVID J. BREWER. MR. DANIEL C. GILMAN. MR. FREDERIC R. COUDERT.

mation and he is convinced that in time the treasure will be found. No systematic search has yet been made for it, the colonists having been too busy planting coffee trees to hunt for the treasure. The leader says that the enterprise will be an assured success from the produce of the coffee plantations, even if no treasure is ever found. He seems to be more prudent than is usual with men who go on such expeditions. They seldom care for anything but the treasure, but this man is providing for certain results in the near future, while hoping to ultimately secure great riches. It is such a prospect, with infinitely better ground of confidence, that the Apostle sets forth when he tells his readers that Godliness is profitable, having promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come. (1. Tim. 4: 8.)

An Erroneous Estimate.
Disappointment has fallen to an engineer, a company and a whole city in New Jersey through an error in an estimate. The Street and Water Commissioners of Jersey City sometime ago accepted the contract of a company to supply twenty million gallons of water a day to the city from the Pequannock River. The pipe was laid, and on January 11 the water was turned on. It was found, however, that the supply did not equal the quantity agreed upon. The engineer went over his calculations again and discovered that it would be impossible for the forty-eight inch pipe that had been laid to carry any more water than it was then doing, which was from ten to twelve million gallons a day. He, therefore, notified the officials that there was no way of fulfilling the engagement, but by laying another pipe, which it would take a year to lay. In the meantime only ten or twelve million gallons a day could be furnished. He regretted the error which was one of calculation, but it was evident that the company could not do what it had undertaken. There was, he said, no deficiency in the source of supply, which was practically inexhaustible, but the avenue of conveyance was not sufficiently capacious. Whether the city will be content to wait a year while the company lays a new main, or whether it will obtain a supply from some other source, remains to be decided. It is vexatious that the difficulty should have arisen. The city ought not to lack pure water when so much is accessible. There is no question as to the responsibility. It is so with the supply of grace and power that the church and individual Christians need for their life and work in the world. The Apostle declares, as the prophets had declared before him, that it is not the Spirit of the Lord that is straitened. But ye are straitened in your own affections. (1. Cor. 6: 12 R.V.)

Providing his Own Coffin.
A press dispatch from Indiana reports a singular provision on the part of a prominent citizen. It states, that a well-known lawyer who has a country house in Bartholomew County had a favorite walnut tree growing in his garden. He planted it forty years ago with his own hands and incidentally remarked that it might serve to make a coffin for him when the time came that one would be needed. The tree thrived and became a tall straight tree and under its branches the judge loved to sit on summer evenings chatting with his friends. He thrived, too, in his fortune and in the respect of the community. He grew old and as his hair whitened and his limbs bent under the weight of the passing years he would look at the tree now grown large of girth and speak of the time when it would be put to the use for which half in jest he had destined it. A few days ago he attained his eighty-seventh birthday and he decided that the time had come to have the tree cut down. He gave the order and a carpenter was instructed to saw into boards. Scarcely had his order been executed when he suffered a paralytic stroke. The carpenter was again summoned and was told to take his measure for the coffin, the judge bidding him hurry in making it. When the dispatch was published the physicians said the judge could not live more than a day or two. It may be hoped that as so long ago, he looked forward to the time when such a receptacle would be required for his body, he did not forget that his soul would, at the same time, need an abiding-place which it might have through the love of God in Christ. The satisfaction he derived at the last from knowing that his whim as to his coffin would be gratified would be as nothing compared with that which would be his if he could say with believing Christians: If the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (11 Cor. 5: 1.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Subscribers who Have Ordered The Christian Herald Library and have not yet received it, are requested to notify us immediately, addressing their letters to "The Library Department." All orders received up to date have been filled as far as we know; but if the Library has not been delivered to any one owing to any error on the part of the Express Companies or any neglect on the part of subscribers—some of whom in their letters ordering the books gave an incomplete address, omitting name of town or State—we shall be glad to rectify the matter on being informed of it. The demand for this premium has exceeded our highest expectations. Our first edition was exhausted within a few days of its being printed. A second edition was printed immediately, but it too was insufficient to fill the orders which were waiting, when it was issued. A third edition of 25,000 was then printed and that also was quickly exhausted. Now we have just received the fourth edition and are ready both to fill new orders and to rectify any mistakes that may have occurred whether through any error on the part of our subscribers or of the express companies. Be sure to address "The Library Department" and give name, town and State of your address and nearest express office.

The First Presbyterian Church of New York celebrated its Jubilee on Jan. 12. The church was organized one hundred and eighty years ago, and has occupied its present building fifty years. Dr. Howard Duffell, the pastor, delivered an address recounting the history of the Church.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has been holding successful revival services at Camden, N. J. The meetings were held in the Broadway M. E. Church which was crowded day after day until the close. Over 2500 persons attended the final service when Dr. Munhall gave parting advice to the great crowd of converts who had made confession of faith during the revival. Several churches united in the movement.

The Young Men's Institute of the New York Y. M. C. A. celebrated its eleventh anniversary in the Institute Hall, 222 Bowery, on Jan. 14. It appeared from the report that last year was one of remarkable activity and prosperity in all branches of the Institute's work. The various clubs and societies which meet in connection with it have increased in number and membership, and the religious meetings were well-attended. The deposits in the Savings Fund of the Institute amount to $8,004. The total expenses of the year were $11,760.

The Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church has issued an earnest appeal for funds. There has been a very serious deficiency since October last in the receipts, which it is hoped may be made up before the time for making the appropriations arrives.

A Petition has been Prepared for Signature by ministers of the Dutch Reformed and the Presbyterian Churches, to the President and Congress urging that in view of the unprecedented cruelties inflicted on inoffensive Armenian men, women and children, to issue an appeal, in the name of outraged humanity, to all the European powers, requesting them to unite with the United States in sending representatives to a Conference which shall devise some means of bringing these unparalleled outrages to an immediate end.

Rev. N. G. Clark, D.D., so long identified with the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, closed his long career on January 3. No man every labored more untiringly than he in the cause of missions, and none could have given time and talent more ungrudgingly to promote the well being of the missionaries in the field. He was beloved by all, and his death will cause sorrow in many a distant station. He was seventy-one years of age. He became Secretary of the Board in 1865.

The Baptist Mission Union of the Bahama Islands which is under the charge of the veteran missionary and indefatigable worker, Rev. Daniel Wilshear, has during the past three years raised seven thousand dollars for its work, has completed the building of two places of worship, has built four others and one mission house, and has commenced the erection of four others on the out islands with one mission house. When it is remembered how poor those people are and how they have been treated by the Missionary Society, their achievements seem extraordinary. Mr. Wilshear's many friends in this country will rejoice to hear of his success, and will heartily wish him and his people continued prosperity.

The Gospel from  Door to Door.

What Two Godly Women are doing among the Crowded Tenements of Upper New York.

EVERY passing year multiplies the opportunities of work for Christ in our great and populous cities. This is especially true of such cities as Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Buffalo, Cincinnati, and New York, and it is proportionately true of cities of lesser magnitude and population. In New York, where the cosmopolitan population embraces almost every nationality under the sun, there is as wide and as inviting a field for real foreign missionary work at home as in any part of the world. Consecrated men and women, have not been slow to perceive this and many have joyfully taken up the burden of soul-winning, and made it their life-work.

One of the best known and most densely populous foreign colonies in the metropolis, is that which goes by the name of Little Italy, in the upper part of the city. There are in the Harlem district from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand Italians, a majority being of the poorest class of immigrants who have come to the United States during the last ten years. Five years ago Miss Anna C. Ruddy, a devoted Christian worker, established in the district an Italian Methodist Church with a growing membership, and also an Italian Girls' Industrial Home at 517 East 117th street, under the auspices of the Woman's Home Missionary Society. Miss Ruddy was a most energetic and successful missionary worker, and both of these institutions were born of unbounded self-sacrifice and untiring labor on her part. Life and reputation were imperilled in the work. Several times Miss Ruddy was escorted home by her congregation, whose members had learned of intended attacks upon the good missionary. The Italians in that part of the city are devoted to Miss Ruddy. To them she is the much-loved "Signorina," to whom they bring all their troubles and perplexities, sure of finding a friendly welcome and wise counsel. They love to call her "the Mother of the Italians."

When the two institutions mentioned were thoroughly organized she turned them over to the care of others, and began what she had long wished to undertake—an undenominational Gospel Mission. This plan had never before been tried among Italians in this country. The preaching of full salvation has been deemed too "strong meat" for those so lately come out of Romanism; but Miss Ruddy has unbounded faith that the nation which produced the martyrs of the Catacombs, and the heroes of the Waldensian Valleys can produce many more of like faith and courage, if only touched by the fire of the Holy Ghost.

The Mission, in its present form, was opened in a hall on Second avenue last May, but has since been removed to quarters on 115th street, New York. From the very beginning the work was successful. The people were urged to give up drink, card-playing and all kindred vices. Many responded readily, and the result has been the conversion of many souls. The mission is now in its second year, and the work is steadily increasing. The mission is now in its second year, and the work is steadily increasing. The mission is now in its second year, and the work is steadily increasing.

him in vain; finally she learned that he had been suddenly seized with a dangerous illness, and for days had besought his Catholic friends to send for the missionary. This they steadily refused to do and sent for the priest instead. Just before he passed away, one of the Mission converts called at the house. Asking her to take a Bible from under his pillow, he said: "Take that to the teacher and tell her it is all right with my soul." In a few minutes he had fallen asleep.

A young musician who had given all his money to have his father's soul released from purgatory, came to this country with the one desire to earn more money for the same purpose. Work was not to be found and on the verge of despair he was contemplating suicide, when, one Sunday afternoon passing the Mission, he heard the strains of music; these were the words that caught his ear:

Savior, take my hand,
Savior, take my hand,
Sweetly my soul shall rest.

As he told the story afterward the words fell on his heart like a great, refreshing shower. He entered, was saved and is now in Italy testifying to the wonderful grace of God.

The services in the Mission Hall are only a small part of the work. Meetings are held in the tenement houses, in saloons, on the streets, and sometimes, in summer, in the back-yards and on house-tops. One of our illustrations shows a Cottage Meeting in the home of a saved Italian. Once it was a drunkard's home and the abode of sin and misery. Now everything is changed; even the home is bright and pretty. These meetings are held in the homes of drunkards and sinners of every class. One meeting was held in a saloon. In a few weeks the saloon-keeper closed up his business, and the building is now used for other purposes of a legitimate nature.

The street-meetings are held Sunday afternoons and are attended by hundreds of people. The people listen attentively and there is never any need for the presence of the police.

Children's work is one of the most interesting features of this Mission. There are over a hundred children in the Mission Sunday School, and there are children's meetings, sewing classes, etc. In this department of the work, Miss Ruddy has for the past five years been most ably seconded by Miss Marion Huntington, whose devotion to the children gives her a wonderful influence over them. She knows the history and special characteristics of every child who ever came to the Mission. Wherever she goes, she is followed by a flock of these admirers. The first convert among the children is now studying for the ministry.

In its present undenominational form, the Mission was begun last May when people were already moving out of town, and financial assistance, while sorely needed, was not forthcoming. Had it not been for the perfect assurance of God's call, the workers could never have passed through that trying time. The Mission Hall was lighted by kerosene lamps. The windows were riddled by the rowdies of the neighborhood, and very few chairs were in the hall. Many times food was scarce and of the poorest quality. God stood by his children, however, and sent help in his own time. Neither of the two workers receives a salary and they are compelled to work as janitresses, besides doing their own house-work in the little flat where they live, with an orphan boy whom Miss Ruddy has taken to educate. Since returning to the old Mission Hall, where God has given so many victories in the past, the congregations have doubled and many souls have accepted Christ as their Saviour.

India's "Sacred Cows."

The crowded streets of Indian cities present manifold attractions, but the study of native life and manners in Delhi is frequently interrupted by the great herds of Brahmini cows, which roam about at their will, with the evident conviction invariably entertained by these pampered animals that their own importance far exceeds that of the community which they inconvenience by their presence. An overturned stall witnesses to the self-assertion of the sacred kine, and as our carriage disperses a blockade of sleek backs and interlacing horns, an indignant member of the scattered conclave wreaks vengeance on the battered chariot by pushing it along with these natural weapons to the end of the street. The raison d'être of the assembled cows is found in the presence of the great Hindu temple, where a glimpse of glittering images in fretted shrines is unwillingly granted to the unbelievers whose feet are forbidden to tread the sacred courts of the Brahmin sanctuary.

A "COTTAGE MEETING" IN A SAVED ITALIAN'S HOME.

Why Let Them Die?

THE sword is devouring Armenia's fair land:
With a foeman so mighty, oh, how can she stand?
They flee, oh they flee, until helpless they lie!
Dear land, blessed with plenty, oh, why let them die?

Oh, dear land of the free, oh, dear home of the brave!
Have pity, have pity, oh, succor and save!
Oh, hear them, oh, hear them, as helpless they lie.
Dear land, blessed with plenty, oh, why let them die?

Oh, dear land of plenty, remember the poor,
Have pity! have pity! relieve and restore,
Oh, hear them, oh, hear them, as helpless they cry.
For good timely succor, oh, why let them die?

RUSSIA'S BURIED CITIES.

DURING the past six months some remarkable antiquities have been brought to light by Russian officials who are conducting excavations on the banks of the rivers Dnieper and Bug, near Stanislav and Kishakooka. The latter village is opposite the ruins of the ancient town of Olbia, a description of which has been given by the "Father of History," Herodotus, wherein he states it to be surrounded by a wall with many towers, and distinguished for its extensive trade and the civilization of its inhabitants. The Listok states that the curator has found the traces of the ruins of the ruins of this ancient and historical capital. The ramparts and inner parts are well preserved, while the ruins of the dwellings are still filled with the ancient building materials used centuries ago, and terra-cotta figures with subjects from domestic life, pottery, and small vessels are still continually being discovered by the villagers. The number of ancient sites discovered by Mr. Goshkevitch during his excursions is fifteen. The general character of these sites may be given as follows: Each one is situated on the steep bank of the river, which forms a natural defence against surprise attacks, and the other three sides are surrounded by ramparts in a good state of preservation, with the ruins of dwelling-places within the walls. One of the most interesting of these sites is called Propastnoe, and is situated on the edge of the ravine of the same name near the monastery of Bisukov. Here many ancient Greek vessels were found, and both here and on the banks of the Bug were found pieces of money of the time of Emperor Theodosius the Great who reigned near the end of the fourth century. In the village of Kishakooka, evident traces were discovered of an ancient Greek settlement, and here the curator discovered a head of a statue in a good state of preservation. Here, also, the peasants a short time ago unearthed a splendid ancient Greek statue, but, being ignorant of its great value, they actually destroyed it, although they sell to the first buyer the coins they find at the ancient site of Olbia and many private persons in those parts have splendid numismatic collections of the Scythian and other periods.

Medical Mission Work in Korea.

In a letter from Mr. J. B. Busted, a American medical missionary of the M. E. Church, at Seoul, Korea, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the writer says: "Perhaps you have not forgotten the Si Pyung Wai the Methodist Episcopal Mission hospital in Korea and how we have been planning for new buildings. This year the Lord has been very good to us and answered our prayers in an unexpected way. We are now at the new site on the South Gate street. On Sept. 5th our new dispensary was opened. This building consists of three rooms, waiting-room, consulting and dispensary drug-room. Thus our outpatient department is well equipped. Our in-patient department consists of one small brick building of two rooms, one serving as a surgical ward and the smaller as temporary operating-room.

"There have been many interesting cures this year, too. Sai Sule Sin is living in No Yang Dong in the town of Kyung Ki Do. He suddenly had a sickness which made his life useless. (He had traumatic cataract.) Directed by the Good Spirit he met a good American doctor who cured him so he could see as before. It will be impossible to ever repay the doctor for his kindness or to tell how great the deed was. He never forgot the doctor. A native writer has sent the good doctor a present of a new house and a beautiful garden. He has a beautiful wife and a beautiful child. His good deeds are truly heavenly.

"Such is the native poetic version of the praise gratefully bestowed upon medical missionaries in Korea."

A Remarkable Memory.

At the Christmas entertainment of the St. Mark's M. E. Church Sabbath School (colored) Montclair, N. J., a member of the female classes, a servant girl who has been present every Sunday for four years, repeated consecutively the titles, topics, and golden texts of the International Series for the years 1894 and 1895, with the books in which they are found, with scarcely a break in their order.

A Norwegian Sabbath.

Church-going Almost Universal Among the rugged and Hardy Peasantry of Norway—Villages Whose People Row to Church.

HERE are still many parts of this Union where the residents are so remote from churches and social privileges that every opportunity of attending service or social gatherings is hailed with delight. Farmers on the wide prairies, settlers on mountain peaks or valleys, and those who live along the shore of river, lake, or sea, will have a kindly appreciation of the lonely lives led by the fisher-folk of Norway, and their rugged, snow-topped mountains and gloomy fjords. Our illustration shows a scene of unusual animation in those solitudes—the gathering of the fisher-people for the regular Sunday morning service. From the most distant points along the great inlet, or fjord, they come in the heavy boats, men and women alike busy at the oar, for strong arms go with stout hearts in Norway. Their toilets are simple and unassuming and they have little of the vanities and futilities that are usually found in a city congregation. Fashions rarely change with the lake fishermen and their friends. A coat is worn till threadbare, a gown until it is no longer serviceable. The costume is adapted to the changeable climate which, while it has great extremes of heat or cold, and is a very salubrious one, is yet frequently so boisterous and tempestuous as to put dainty garments out of the question. This constant conflict with nature in her strongest moods has resulted in a hardy and beautiful race.

In no part of the world are the waters so subject to the stress and rack of fiercer storms than there, and in no other part are the same waters capable of falling in ten days into a more perfect and absolute rest. In Norway, practically the entire population is Protestant, and their faith brings them, with each recurring Sunday morning, over the water on their way to church. The manners and faces of these people are marked with truth and virtue, and the uniform happiness of Norwegian homes is proverbial.

Our illustration is from a photograph of a famous painting by Hans Dahl, and is now presented by permission of the Fine Art Publishing Company of New York. It is the gem of a great collection, and the original was exhibited at the World's Fair Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893. In our own country, a growing evil is seen in the custom of Christian parents who do not take their children with them on Sunday to the preaching services, but allow them to think that it is enough if they only attend the Sabbath School. Actually, such a course results in encouraging the young people to disregard a most important feature of church work in church life. It tends to lessen church-going. An old writer has said: "Though it was God's appointment that the males only should, at solemn feasts, pair to Shiloh, yet Elkanah carries up all his house to the yearly sacrifice. You know what a great blessing succeeded upon Hannah." There should be a return to the good old custom of having the whole family at the preaching service.

The "Small Boy."

Small boys, we all agree, are at times supremely exasperating. But if you have not patience with your own, who is to show it them? If you have not patience, it means that you have not love; at least when one breaks down, the other will. Every failure in patience on your part means a loosening of the bond by which you have to hold that boy back from ruin. You have no right to expect that any one will hold him back if you do not. The temptations of all kinds lying before him are so tremendous that you will need all your love for him, and all your strength, and you must not weaken both at once by giving way to impatience towards your own child. If you say that you are not born with pain their business? I confidently answer—at home. Good management and frugality there are apt to mean prosperity. Extravagance there means vexation, temptation to recklessness, and business gambling, and eventual ruin. Half the married men who practice swindling are pushed on to it by a wicked friend or an extravagant wife and family. A wife is the best of friends or the worst of enemies. It is of little account to a man to be prosperous in his store, or his office, or his pulpit if he be wretched at his own hearthstone. On the other hand, a wife can bear any social neglect, any stroke of adversity, and even to be ignored by "society" if her husband is only loving and her children are affectionate and obedient. But a husband's unkindness is a dry sorrow that drinks her heart's blood. Good Philip Henry said that he and his wife adopted a rule that only one of them would get angry at the same time. That "scotched" the serpent of conjugal quarrels. When husband and wife make common cause in enthroning Jesus Christ over their household, and in barring out the enemies that threaten the peace and purity of the home, then domestic life becomes as sweet as a song and as holy as a sacrament.

Children's Sense of Color.

It sometimes happens that the sense of color and form is developed very early. One scientist, experimenting with his own children, found, toward the end of the second year as to their color discrimination, that a decided preference was shown for the bright or luminous colors, red and yellow. Much the

The Old Sabbath.

HOLD fast to the dear old Sabbath, To the duty of peaceful rest; Look back to the days of childhood That its tranquil glories blessed; Hold fast to its quiet pleasures, All its sweet traditions save, For the sake of the weary living, And the memories of the grave. Hold fast to the dear old Sabbath, That is neared, like a verdant isle, On the week's dull sea of toiling, With a thankful, happy smile, One day give the great Creator, Be thy creed what'er it may; For the sake of human freedom Keep the dear, old Sabbath day.

Learning the Clock.

WHEN you were learning to tell the time on the face of the clock on the mantel-shelf, how did you begin? Was it not by first learning the quarters? When the long hand was half way down on the right, you knew it was a quarter past; when it was half way up on the left, you knew it was a quarter-to; and when it was down between these, you knew it was half-past; and when it was up between them you knew the clock was going to strike the hour. Well, just as there are four quarters in our clocks, so there are four quarters in this big clock of our universe. The first quarter is Springtime, half-past is Summer, quarter-to is Autumn, and when Winter comes the year is ended. When you look at the trees and flowers you can pretty well tell what o'clock it is by the year. When you see the little crocus or snow-drop begin to peep out, or see the hedges become dotted with green specks, then you say, it is a quarter past Winter—and that is Springtime. And when you see the flowers in full bloom, and the chestnut trees laden with their beautiful blossoms, and the corn has become tall, then you say, it is half-past Winter—and that is Summer. When you begin to see fruit—when the marigolds are beginning to have seed, and when the little boys out for a holiday throw sticks up into the branches to bring down the chestnuts, and pears and apples look tempting on the trees, and the corn has grown yellow and hangs its head very humbly because it has now something in its head (for they are only empty heads that stand up pert), then you say, it is a quarter-to Winter—and that is Autumn. And when you find the fields all reaped and bare, and the flowers are beginning to fade away, and the fruit is all gone, then you say, it is getting close on the hour—and that is Winter; the year is done. Thus, you see, the big clock can tell the time o' year, and tell it exactly, by quarters.

But standing between the quarters of the clock there are other figures. How many of these are there altogether? Twelve, are there not? And how many months are there in a year? You know—twelve. So, you see, this clock has got all the figures, and, what is stranger still, it marks all the figures by flowers and fruits; for there are different flowers that come out every month of the year. If a smart boy were to keep his eyes about him, and understood things as he walked in the country, when he found certain trees beginning to bud and certain flowers beginning to peep up, he would say, this must be the month of January; for these always come out in January. Later on, if he saw some others, he would say, this must be February, for these always come out in February. And so through all the year, if he was clever, he would find flowers and trees telling him what month it was.

Our God is very kind to the flowers. If he lets some grow till late in the year before he puts them to sleep, he doesn't wake them so early the next season: He knows they need to sleep longer because they were up so late—just as you are sometimes allowed to lie in bed a little longer. But again, God sometimes sends some flowers to sleep early, and maybe they don't like it, as you often don't; but then he is going to awaken them early in the season, they will be among the first he will call up.

ROWING TO CHURCH ACROSS THE NORWEGIAN FJORDS.

tience, we would urge you to think on these matters and acquire it.

Girls' Advantages.

Girls are usually less mischievous than boys, less defiant, less noisy (many a complication in home life has arisen from noise); they are, moreover, less restive when being read aloud to on Sunday mornings, and there is less of a struggle with them when it comes to that trying duty of getting up in time for prayers. They are less inclined to be rude to their teachers, and if they sometimes chase the chickens or worry the cat, it is because their brothers lead them on. In later years, also, it is comparatively easy for a mother to lift her daughter's thoughts to her own ideal of life, simply because she can keep her constantly with her, while the son is away at school. All this and much more of the same kind may be truly said, and seems to show beyond question that in respect of what is called good behavior, the gentler sex start life with fairer opportunities than their brothers.

Enemies of the House.

Very often a man's foes, and sometimes a wife's foes, are "they are of his or her own household," writes Dr. Cuyler. "Where do most men find their greatest help or their greatest hindrance to success same thing was observed by another in the early development of her child's color sense. Thus in the twenty-eighth month a baby girl showed a special fondness for daffodils. About the same time the child conceived a fondness for a yellow gown of her aunt, strongly objecting to the substitution for it of a brown dress. Among the other colored objects which captivated the eye of this little girl were a patch of white cherry blossom and a red sunset sky. Such observations might easily be multiplied. Whiteness, it is to be noted, comes, as we might expect, with bright partial colors, among the first favorites.

Housework as Exercise.

To keep the complexion and spirits good, to preserve grace, strength, and agility of motion, there is no gymnasium so valuable, no exercise more beneficial in result than sweeping, dusting, making beds, washing dishes and the polishing of brass and silver. One year of such muscular effort within doors, together with regular exercise in open air, will do more for a woman's complexion than all the lotions and pomades that were ever invented. Perhaps the reason why housework does so much more for women than games, is the fact that exercise which is immediately productive cheers the spirit. It gives women the courage to go on living, and makes things seem really worth while.

Christ's Warnings.

Questions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning Feb. 9.
Mat. 7: 21-27.

WE have become so accustomed to dwell on the gentleness, compassion, patience, and infinite love of Christ, that it is important sometimes to realize that there is another side to his character. "I never knew you; depart from me," are words that seem strange on those lips. Yet this is nothing incongruous or inconsistent in uttering them. We have abundant illustrations of gentleness and indignation being found in the same character, or consistently, too. A mother whose patience and tenderness to her children seems inexhaustible, whose kindness and love are the very foundations of life, would fight like a fiend to protect them from the cruel child-stealer. Gentleness, then? No, the most brutal assassin would be more likely to show mercy than she. A woman who gives her life to nursing the sick poor, who is kind under querulous complaint, whom it seems impossible to provoke to retort, who seems to have no spark of self-assertion, or of anger in her being, will blaze forth in wrath at withering indignation at some cruel wrong done to another, or at some culpable negligence which entails suffering on some inoffensive victim. Nor is self-assertion lacking in such a character. Such women have been known to rebuke vicious men, and to show a scorn in repelling impure suggestion, that has made the most shameless quail under their contempt. Gentle natures are by their very being capable of the most unmitigated anger, when the power of their tenderness is checked in righteous wrath.

What, then, is it that can excite such wrath in the gentle Saviour? His warning is clear. He left his hearers in no doubt as to the cause which could so stir his indignation, that he would exclude a man from his society, and would blot him eternally from his kingdom. Hypocrisy was odious to him. The people who would hear him and profess to obey him, who would call him Lord and call themselves by his name, yet ignore his commands, and live their own lives in their own way, were no people of his. He never knew them. They were unfit for his kingdom, and could not be admitted into it. Browning's exquisite poem, "The Murderer," claims privilege of clergy to escape the gallows. Many men had escaped by that means, for it was common in the days of which the poet writes, "men who led dissolute lives" to take the first steps of preparation for the priesthood, so that in an emergency they might claim the special privileges accorded to the clergy. It is in this instance the Pope is a man of justice, and when it was told that the murderer claimed exemption because he was a priest, he was indignant. "Let him be executed," he said, "if he were no times the priest he claims to be, he could die."

The gentle Saviour is not to be set at naught with impunity. Men must not presume on his gentleness. Men who take his name upon them must be pure, as he is pure. Selfishness must have no place in their lives. They must love and serve, otherwise they are unworthy of him, and they disgrace him by using his name. Power to live the Christ-life is at their disposal, and if a man calling himself a Christian is not living it, he has no excuse, and will learn that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

What Wilt Thou Have Me to Do?

FAR, far from thee, Lord, I have wandered,
But, oh, I am weary of sin;
My ways I have bitterly pondered,
And better things now would begin.
My sins thou hast lovingly pardoned,
Thy grace will my spirit renew;
No longer my heart shall be hardened—
"Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

CHORUS:

Lord, what wilt thou have me to do—to be?
Now teach me thy purpose to know;
Oh, tell me the work I may do for thee,
Lord, where wilt thou have me to go?
I know of thy great loving-kindness,

I know of thy patience and might
That found me in sorrow and blindness,
And brought me to gladness and light.
Thy mercy, oh, God, is far-reaching,
That reaches to sinners like me;
But, Father, I need further teaching—
Oh, what wilt thou have me to be?

Somewhere thou wilt give me some labor,
Though ocean or plain must be crossed,
There's surely some far or near neighbor
To rescue before he is lost.
Lord, may I help some other sinner?
And make thy dear kingdom to grow?
Somewhere I would be a soul-winner—
Lord, where wilt thou have me to go?

The Prophecy on the Mount,

The Double Application of our Lord's Predictions Recorded in Matt. 24.
BY REV. RICHARD CHESTER, A.B.

OW are the two aspects of the Second Advent, which this chapter presents, to be reconciled? There is but one way that I know of, or can conceive.

Our blessed Lord's First Advent, foretold throughout the Old Testament Scriptures as one event, consisted nevertheless of two very distinct acts or parts. Even so I believe that the Scriptures which foretell his Second Advent do, not obscurely or uncertainly, reveal to us that it in like manner will consist of two separate acts or parts. To this latter aspect of his advent and to its memorable type in the destroying judgment upon Jerusalem under Titus, our Lord, I believe, refers exclusively in Matthew 24: 1-35. To the former aspect of the Advent, I, for my part, feel perfectly satisfied that he refers altogether in the sequel of the chapter, verses 36 to the end.

It may, however, not unnaturally be asked, why, if such be the case, should the reference to what you regard as the first part of the Advent be mentioned last. The obvious reason for this is not, it seems to me, difficult to determine. Our blessed Lord was led to the whole subject by the fact of his disciples having directed his attention to the buildings of the Temple, and by the questions which they put to him concerning the overthrow of these buildings, when he had announced it to them. He had, therefore, to deal first with the events connected with that overthrow, and with that aspect of his Second Advent of which they formed so remarkable a type. That such is the tenor of this portion of the chapter seems very evident from the language of verses 15-21. None but those actually in Jerusalem at the time can witness the setting up of "the abomination of desolation," which I have already shown to be a yet future event. To none else can the words of verse 16, "Then let them which be in Judea flee unto the mountains," have any possible application, or the future warning of verses 17-19. While the exhortation of verse 20, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day"—utterly inapplicable to, and therefore never acted upon or obeyed by, any members of the Christian Church—seems conclusive upon the matter.

If it be thus manifest that the language of this first portion of the prophecy is specially intended for Jewish disciples as such, no less evident is it that the sequel of the chapter (v. 36 to the end) has a general application, was addressed to, and intended for, the disciples in their then future, but soon to be occupied, position as the first members of the Christian Church, and representatives, as such, of all its members to the end of the age.

The first portion is specially designed for those upon whom the Advent would come in connection with trials and dangers out of which they were to flee, the latter for those whom the Advent would find working in the field, grinding at the mill, engaged in their ordinary everyday avocations; and of whom one would be "taken" and the other would be "left." The exhortation to these accordingly is not, "Pray that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." It is, verse 42, "Watch therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come."

Sankey's Hymns Sung in London

It is announced, through the London newspapers, that a change is to be made in the service of the Metropolitan Tabernacle. Hereafter one of the hymns to be sung at the regular service is to be selected from Mr. Sankey's "Songs and Solos." The popularity of these famous Gospel songs is steadily increasing among the English people.

A Young Man's Religious Life.*

HERE is in every man and woman not alone substance of material matter, but a spiritual nature, which, if kept in daily contact with its God, finds a response such as can come from no finite source. This truth no young man can hesitate to believe—the efficacy of prayer. It requires no creed to believe it, no dogma, no form of religion. It is a simple belief that to ask a heavenly guidance in all things good and right means a fruition of the highest and best hopes of a man. With this absolute faith in the existence of a God, and in prayer, only one thing more is needed to complete the fundamental basis of all religions—an honest effort to live according to our conscience and to the best and truest that is within ourselves.

Here, then, is a simple religion for any young man. If his heart craves it and his mind can compass it, he can go deeper into the question and believe more. But less he cannot accept. Nor, if he is wise, will he wish to accept less. All objections fall before so simple a code of belief. It asks for no great mental capacity; it is beyond the mental power of none. The rising and setting of the sun, the coming of the seasons, the downfall of night upon day, the birth of a child, the death of a man—everything proves to the humblest mind that this is a religion which it can accept without hesitancy, without a single misgiving. When we go beyond these fundamental principles we go into questions which are complex, and open to individual construction. However a young man may decide for himself those questions, he cannot shirk the three points I have dwelt upon. They will teach him a respect for all sacred things, without which no man can earn respect for himself. They will teach him charity for the faults of others, without which none can hope for leniency for his own shortcomings. They will teach him to hold out the helping hand to others, without which he can himself never succeed. They will keep him close to the teachings and the beliefs of his mother, without which a young man is untrue to the source from which he sprang.

The great trouble with young men is that their ideas are altogether too much influenced by a few unfortunate examples of apparent success which are prominent—too prominent, alas!—in American life to-day. These examples, for the most part representing politicians, are regarded in the eyes of the world as successful; that is, they are talked about incessantly; interviewed by reporters; they lavishly buy diamonds for their wives and build costly houses; and all these are duly reported in the newspapers. Young men read these things and ask themselves, "If he can, why not I?" Then they begin to look around for some "short cut to success," as one young fellow expressed it to me not long since. And it is precisely through this method of "cutting across lots" in business that scores of young men find themselves, after awhile, completely baffled. And the man who has once had about him an unsavory taint in his business, how can he ever rid himself of that atmosphere in the eyes of his conferees. How often we see some young man in business representative of the very best qualities that should win success! Every one agrees that he is brilliant. "He is clever," is the general verdict. He impresses one well in his manner, he is thoroughly businesslike, is energetic, and yet, somehow or other, he never seems to get in a place and stick there. People wonder at it, and excuse it on the ground that he has not quite found his right place. But some day the secret is explained. "Yes, he is clever," says some old business man, "but, don't you know, he isn't—well, he isn't just safe!" Just safe! How much that expresses; how clearly that defines hundreds and hundreds of the smartest young men in business to-day! He is everything else, but he isn't "just safe!" He is not dishonest in any way, but he is, what is equally as bad, not quite reliable. To attain success he has, in other words, tried to "cut across lots." And rainbow chasing is really a very commendable business in comparison with a young man's search for the "royal road to success." No success worth attaining is easy. "Royal roads" are poor highways to travel in any pursuit, and especially in a business calling.

Mysterious Lake Chad.*

ONE of the objects of our journey was to explore Lake Chad, or at all events, to stand upon its shores and look out upon its waters. We discovered before going very far that a large part of Lake Chad is taken up by islands, some of them quite small, and others of goodly size. The smaller ones are not inhabited, but the larger and higher ones have a considerable population. Before leaving Mourzouk we were told that we would have great difficulty in navigating the lake, as the natives were hostile and very jealous of the intrusion of foreigners. We were agreeably disappointed in this matter, as we found them friendly, with the exception of one island, where the people refused to allow us to land. They came down to the shore with spears in their hands, and made such demonstrations of hostility that their words were unnecessary to explain their feelings toward us.

During all of our first day upon the waters, we were in a labyrinth of islands, and if our boatmen had deserted us, we would have experienced great difficulty in finding our way back to the starting point. Our first night was passed on an island where there was a small village. Not more than half of the surface of the island was tillable, the rest being a marsh, where the reeds and papyrus plants grew to a height of ten or twelve feet. The natives received us very kindly; they erected grass huts for our accommodation, and supplied us with kouskousou, made from wheat and also from Indian corn. It seems that they cultivate both of these grains, together with onions, beans, and other vegetables. They had a good sized herd of cattle, and flocks of sheep and goats; we bought a sheep for about ten cents' worth of copper wire, and the native who sold it to us acted as though he had made the best bargain of his lifetime. The sheikh was very attentive, and when we left the next morning we presented him with a large cotton handkerchief, on which was printed the Declaration of Independence and a portrait of George Washington. He had not the remotest idea of the printing upon the handkerchief, but the gaudy colors took his fancy, and his face wore an expression of ecstatic happiness.

Most of the native dwellings on the islands are made of grass and reeds, but on the larger islands many of the houses are constructed with regular walls of clay or mud. The Bidduma are supposed to be governed by a sheikh, who lives on one of the larger islands, and whose town or village is the most populous of all.

We skirted the islands of the western shore, coming to land occasionally and making friends with the natives. Sometimes we found quite a difference in complexion and other peculiarities of the people of one island and those of another, indicating that they are not of the same tribe, but had come there from different localities. There was also a difference in costume, but this, however, was not great, owing to the fact that the Bidduma generally have no costume to speak of. The ordinary natives usually wear nothing more than a strip of cloth about the waist; sometimes, in cold or stormy weather, they wrap themselves in mats or blankets woven out of reeds and grass. The Bidduma sheikhs mark their superiority over their subjects by wearing a white bournous over a robe or shirt of black or brown material, and covering their heads with turbans. Some of the people wear leather aprons about the waist, and strings of beads around the neck, and these two articles constitute their only clothing. The effect is better than one might suppose, as the beads make a very pretty contrast against the black skin of the body; the skin is of a rich, velvety appearance, and from constant exposure it runs no risk of blistering in the sun.

Asthma, Bronchitis and Kindred Disease "Catarrh Permanently Cured"

BOSTON, MASS., April 20, 1894. (Care Jordan, Marsh & Co.)
Dear Sir: I had catarrh for twenty years, and the last ten years (all of which time I been passed in this great establishment) I suffered fearfully. One half-dozen handkerchiefs per day would be used. It extended to my throat; the base of my tongue was badly affected. I constantly kept in my mouth cardamon seeds, or some such breath purifier. I could sleep with my mouth closed. I began using Hyomei in December, and in two weeks was entirely cured—and now, after four months and no return of the disease, I can say, permanently—cured. I am going to ask the head of the firm, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, to indorse this statement.
MRS. ELVIRA E. B. GIBSON.

Indorsed—Eben D. Jordan.

[PRAYER IN DROUGHT.]

C LETTER from a farmer in New South Wales to his relatives in England reports a very welcome change of weather, for which united prayer had been presented. He says: "The drought has broken up at last. The dry weather has played fearful havoc. The losses among sheep, cattle, and horses have been very serious. A neighbor of mine who had fifty head of cattle, now has nine; the others have perished from want of grass and water. The creeks are lined with dead cattle and sheep. Feeding was impossible, as feed could not be bought except at famine prices, and few people had money sufficient to buy it. Miles and miles of country have been burned black, nothing escaping the onward march of the flames, and high winds have prevailed without stoppage for the past three weeks."

It is estimated that the colony has lost twenty million sheep; cattle in an unknown quantity as yet. As far as I am personally concerned I have been fortunate. I kept what hay and ensilage I had, with a view to selling later when prices would advance, but I have been forced to feed it all away to stock. I keep nine horses here, and have not lost one. I have lost two good cows and three young ones; the rest are all right.

Sunday last, by order of the acting Governor-General, was set apart as a day of prayer for rain. According to the meteorologists there was not a cloud to be seen in any of the Australian colonies, and no rain had fallen for months. In twenty-four hours rain was falling all over the colonies, and during the last week we have had over three inches. What a change! Everyone has a smile now; grass is growing fast, and in another three weeks there will be full and plenty. Sunday next is thanksgiving day for the late rains. People were beginning to think there would be no harvest this year; but there is every prospect of an abundant harvest, thank God.

Excavations in Egypt.

SOME very interesting discoveries have recently been made in the course of the excavations now in progress at Dashur, Egypt. Director General de Morgan, who is in charge of the work, has since November last been excavating simultaneously at the three temples of Karnak, Medinet-Habou, and Philae. Excavations at Medinet-Habou will be completed by the end of the present winter; at Philae by the 1st of January, 1897; while at Karnak there will be a far longer task, that will require a very large capital. Mr. de Morgan estimates that $1,000,000 is needed to clear entirely this immense gathering of temples, and to put up again out of the ancient material the crumbled portions.

The Temple of Karnak, the grandest and by far the most colossal historical record left by antiquity, was called the dwelling of Ammon. It is a vast gathering of gigantic ruins, including monuments of various periods, erected in honor of the Theban Ammon. As far as is known at present, the oldest building at Karnak dates back to the XIIth dynasty. It was a sanctuary constructed by the King User-sen I., who reigned from 2433 to 2400 B. C., as coregent and successor to Amenemhat I., the founder of that dynasty. His pyramid was identified last year at Lisht, near the entrance of the Fayum. Amenophis III. (1500 B. C.), the Memnon of the Greeks, added considerably to Karnak. Under his rule Egypt stretched from Mesopotamia to Abyssinia. The self-praise of the King, says Mariette, may be read to-day upon the architraves of the temple at Luxor. The bas-relief and inscriptions decorating the hypostyle Temple of Karnak are among the most precious historical documents. The outside north wall commemorates the campaigns of Seti I. in western Asia, while on the southern side of the same temple are recorded the wars of Sheshonk I. in Palestine. After the schism of the ten tribes this King Sheshonk gave an exile to the fugitive Jeroboam, and with him invaded Judea and plundered Jerusalem in the year 962 B. C.

The Temple of Karnak was pillaged and ransacked in the early part of the fifth century by the Persian army of Cambyses, when he came back infuriated by his disastrous expedition in the Soudan; but it is to an earthquake during the beginning of our era that is due the actual dilapidated and shaky condition of the monument, the largest and at the same time one of the oldest and finest in existence.

The Hindoo Boy's Lesson.

There was a good man in India once, a missionary. His name was Swartz. He had a little servant boy to look after his pony and cook his food. His name was David. One day the missionary and his boy had been traveling from village to village, that Mr. Swartz might preach to the villagers. In the evening, it was David's duty to prepare some rice for his master. When cooked, it was called curry. He made it ready under a large tree, and when it was quite ready the missionary stood under the spreading branches of the tree to give thanks to God for the curry. He knew that it had come to him from God. He knew that it was one of God's bread-knocks, and the good man hastened to open his heart and let God in. So he began to pray, but as he prayed, he could not help thinking of all the other things which had come to him in the same hand of God. And his heart overflowed with thankfulness. And the love of God so filled his thoughts that he could not stop. But poor David was only a boy, and did not understand these things as his master did. And he thought his master was making too long a prayer, and he went near, and touched him, and said: "Master, the curry is cold." But his master did not stop; he went on praying a good long time. But when he did stop he turned to David and said: "David, shall the kind Jesus watch over us through the heat and burden of the day, and provide food for us in the evening, and shall we eat food with hands that have never been raised in prayer, and lips which have never praised him?" David never forgot these words. He never stopped his master at grace again. And long after the holy Swartz had gone up to heaven, David continued preaching to men.

BOWERY MISSION'S DISPENSARY.

Since the Opening of the Free Dispensary in connection with the Bowery Mission, there has been a constant increase in the demand from the East-side poor for free medical and surgical service. In one day, during the recent spell of zero weather in New York City, seven frozen fingers were amputated by the surgeon in charge at the Dispensary. The intense cold has greatly multiplied the sufferings of the poor. At the present time, an average of thirty cases of all kinds, are treated at the Free Dispensary daily.

A New Poet Laureate.

HERE is always something of a breeze stirred in the literary world when a new poet laureate is chosen by England to succeed to the post that has been honored by such names as Wordsworth and Tennyson. is, of course, taken for granted that the official poet of the sovereign has a warm admiration for his own country and a deep and unswerving loyalty to the throne whose praises he is expected to hymn when fitting opportunities arise. Some-

ALFRED AUSTIN,
England's New Poet Laureate.

at of a surprise was felt, lately, among English versifiers at the appointment of Alfred Austin, as the new Laureate, it had been expected by many that the crown and the income that goes with it, might seek some more widely known poet. But Mr. Austin is a writer of undoubted talent, and has made a distinct place for himself among the later Victorian writers of verse. He was born at Headingley, near Leeds, in 1835. His father was a merchant and magistrate of Leeds. He received a thorough collegiate education.

At the age of eighteen he published his first poem, "Randolph," and the first volume of verse which bore his name, "The Season: a Satire," appeared in 1861. The "Human Tragedy," "Madonna's Child," "Savonarola," and "English Lyrics" are some of his best-known volumes of verse, of which a collected edition was published in 1892 in six volumes.

Mr. Austin has been a prolific writer of prose as well as of poetry, and has taken part in many controversies of the day. One of his most delightful prose books is "The Garden that I Love," a charming description of his own residence at Swinford Old Manor, in Kent.

The virtues of his poetic creed are set forth concisely in a stanza in the little volume called In Veronica's Garden, which is a mixture of prose and verse. He therein declares:

Wouldst thou sing of sceptred kings,
The tyrant and his thrall,
Of saturnian pathos things
That happen to us all;
The love that lasts through joy, through grief,
The faith that never wanes
And every wilding bird and leaf
That gladdens English lanes.

About fifteen years ago, in the month of May, when Mr. Austin was at Delphi, a reek priest tore from a tree in full flower

An Asthma Cure at Last.

Combs, Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that it cured him of asthma of fifty years standing, and Hon. L. G. Ste. of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he lay sleep propped up in a chair, being unable to lie down night or day from Asthma. The Kola cured him at once. To make the matter sure, and hundreds of other cures are sworn to under the name of a notary public. So great is their faith in the wonderful curative powers, the Kola Import Co., 174 Broadway, New York, is sending out 500 trial cases of the Kola compound free to all sufferers from Asthma. Send them your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a free trial case by mail free. It costs you nothing if you should not surely try it.

A Disaster Averted.

A missionary who was in Antananarivo, the capital of Madagascar when it was surrendered to the French, writes of a thrilling incident of the siege. "The Queen's flag," he says, "was lowered not a minute too soon. Had it remained flying but two minutes longer the consequences would have been terrible. Up to that moment the French had only fired a few ordinary shells into the city; but the order had now been given to load the guns with melenite shells, and a general bombardment from all the heights was about to commence when the Hova flag was seen to drop. It appears that 10,000 barrels of gunpowder and an immense quantity of cartridges were stored in the palace. The French, of course, knew nothing of this; but, as their fire was to have been principally directed on the palace, it is almost certain that a melenite shell would have ignited this vast accumulation of powder and brought about a most destructive explosion. The palace and all their buildings in that quarter of the town would have been leveled to the ground."

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

THE KING'S HIGHWAY.

Text: Isaiah 35: 8, 9, 10, "And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called, The way of holiness," etc.

HERE are hundreds of people in this house who want to find the right road. You sometimes see a person halting at cross roads, and you can tell by his looks that he wishes to ask a question—as to what direction he had better take. And I stand in your presence conscious of the fact that there are many of you here who realize that there are a thousand wrong roads, but only one right one; and I take it for granted that you have come in to ask which one it is. Here is one road that opens widely, but I have not much faith in it. There are a great many expensive toll-gates scattered all along that way. Indeed at every rod you must pay in tears, or pay in genuflections, or pay in flagellations. On that road, if you get through it at all, you have to pay your own way; and since this differs so much from what I have heard in regard to the right way, I believe it is the wrong way. Here is another road. On either side of it are houses of sinful entertainment, and invitations to come in and dine and rest; but from the looks of the people who stand on the piazza, I am certain it is the wrong house and the wrong way. Here is another road. It is very beautiful and macadamized. The horses' hoofs clatter and ring, and they who ride over it spin along the highway, until suddenly they find that the road breaks over an embankment, and they try to halt, and they saw the bit in the mouth of the fiery steed, and cry "Ho! ho!" But it is too late, and—crash!—they go over the embankment. We shall turn and see if we cannot find a different kind of road. You have heard of the Appian Way. It was three hundred and fifty miles long. It was twenty-four feet wide, and on either side of the road was a path for foot passengers. It was made out of rocks cut in hexagonal shape and fitted together. What a road! It was built by the Romans, and it was three hundred and fifty miles long. No wonder that in the construction of it the Romans used a whole empire of slaves. Because of invaders, and the earthquake, and the old empire who had built it, nothing left of that structure but a ruin. But I have heard you say a road built by the Romans, the Appian Way, and yet it is as good and safe as the modern roads. Millions of souls have gone over it. Millions more will come.

learn the majesty of a road built and supported by governmental authority. Well, my Lord the King decided to build a highway from earth to heaven. It should span all the chasms of human wretchedness; it should tunnel all the mountains of earthly difficulty; it should be wide enough and strong enough to hold fifty thousand millions of the human race, if so many of them should ever be born. It should be blasted out of the "Rock of Ages," and cemented with the blood of the Cross, and be lifted amid the shouting of angels and the execration of devils. The King sent his Son to build that road. He put head, and hand, and heart to it, and after the road was completed waved his blistered hand over the way, crying: "It is finished!" Napoleon paid fifteen million francs for the building of the Simplon Road, that his cannon might go over for the devastation of Italy; but our King, at a greater expense, has built a road for a different purpose, that the banners of heavenly dominion might come down over it. Being a King's highway, of course it is well built. Bridges splendidly arched and buttressed have given way and crushed the passengers who attempted to cross them. But Christ, the King, would build no such thing as that. The work done, he mounts the chariot of his love, and multitudes mount with him, and he drives on and up the steep of heaven amid the plaudits of gazing worlds! The work is done—well done—gloriously done—magnificently done.

Still further: this road spoken of is a clean road. Many a fine road has become miry and foul because it has not been properly cared for; but my text says the unclean shall not walk on this one. Room on either side to throw away your sins. Indeed, if you want to carry them along you are not on the right road. That bridge will break, those overhanging rocks will fall, the night will come down, leaving you at the mercy of the mountain bandits, and at the very next turn of the road you will perish. But if you are really on this clean road of which I have been speaking, then you will stop ever and anon to wash in the water that stands in the basin of the eternal rock.

Aye, at almost every step of the journey you will be crying out: "Create within me a clean heart." If you have no such aspirations as that, it proves that you have mistaken your way; and if you will only look up and see the finger-board above your head, you may read upon it the words: "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof is death." Without holiness no man shall see the Lord; and if you have any idea that you can carry along your sins, your lusts, your worldliness, and yet get to the end of the Christian race, you are so awfully mistaken, that, in the name of God, I shudder at the delusion.

Still further: the road spoken of is a plain road. "The wandering men, though fools, shall not err therein." That is, if a man is three-fourths in doubt, he can find this road just as well as if he were a philosopher. The imbecile boy, the laughing-stock of the street, and followed by a mob hooting at him, has only just to knock once at the gate of heaven, and it swings open; while there has been many a man who can lecture about pneumatics, and chemistry, and tell the story of Faraday's theory of electrical polarization, and yet has been shut out of heaven. There has been many a man who stood in an observatory and swept the heavens with his telescope, and yet has not been able to see the Morning Star. Many a man has been familiar with all the higher branches of mathematics, and yet could not do the simple sum: "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Many a man has been a fine reader of tragedies and poems, and yet could not "read his title clear to mansions in the skies." Many a man has botanized across the continent, and yet not known the "Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the Valley." But if one shall come in the right spirit, asking the way to heaven, he will find it a plain way. The pardon is plain. The peace is plain. Everything is plain. He who tries to get on the road to heaven through the New Testament teaching will get on beautifully. He who goes through philosophical discussion will not get on at all. Christ says: "Come to me, and I will take all your sins away, and I will take all your troubles away." Now what is the use of my discussing it any more? Is not that plain? If you wanted to go to some city, and I pointed you out a highway thoroughly laid out, would I be wise in detaining you by a geological discussion about the gravel you will pass over, or a physiological discussion about the muscles you will have to bring into play? No. After this Bible has pointed you the way to heaven, it is wise for me to detain you with any discussion about the nature of the human will, or whether the atonement is limited or unlimited? There is the road—go on it. It is a plain way. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." And that is you and that is me. Any little child here can understand this as well as I can. "Unless you become as a little child, you cannot see the kingdom of God." If you are saved, it will not be as a philosopher, it will be as a little child. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Unless you get the spirit of little children, you will never come out at their glorious destiny.

Still further: this road to heaven is a safe road. Sometimes the traveler in those ancient highways would think himself perfectly secure, not knowing there was a lion by the way, burying his head deep between his paws, and then, when the right moment came, under the fearful spring the man's life was gone, and there was a mauled carcass by the roadside. But, says my text, "No lion shall be there." I wish I could make you feel your entire security. I tell you plainly that one minute after a man has become a child of God, he is as safe as though he had been ten thousand years in heaven. He may slip, he may slide, he may stumble; but he cannot be destroyed. Kept by the power of God, through faith, unto complete salvation. Everlastingly safe. The severest trial to which you can subject a Christian man is to kill him, and that is glory. In other words, the worst thing that can happen a child of God is heaven. The body is only the old slippers that he throws aside just before putting on the sandals of light. His soul, you cannot hurt it. No fires can consume it. No floods can drown it. No devils can capture it.

From the hymns of the Bible:
"Who shall be able to stand on God's side, when the great David stood,
On the shore, the land abode."

His soul is safe. His reputation is safe. Everything is safe. "But," you say, "suppose his store burns up?" Why then it will be only a change of investments from earthly to heavenly securities. "But," you say, "suppose his name goes down under the hoof of scorn and contempt?" The name will be so much brighter in glory. "Suppose his physical health fails?" God will pour into him the floods of everlasting health, and it will not make any difference. Earthly subtraction is heavenly addition. The tears of earth are the crystals of heaven. As they take and tatters and put them through the paper-mill, and they come out beautiful white sheets of paper, so often the ragged earthly destitution, under the cylinder of death, come out a white scroll upon which shall be written eternal emancipation. There was one passage of Scripture, the force of which I never understood until one day at Chamounix, with Mont Blanc on one side, and Montanvert on the other. I opened my Bible and read: "As mountains are around about Jerusalem, the Lord is around about them that trust in him." The surroundings were an ominous commentary.

Though troubles assail, and dangers affright,
Though friends surround all fail, and foes all
Yet one thing secures us, whatever betide,
The Scripture assures us the Lord will provide.

Still further: the road spoken of is a pleasant road. God gives a bond of indemnity against all evil to every man that treads it. "All things work together for good to those who love God." No war formed against them can prosper. It is the bond, signed, sealed, and delivered by the President of the whole universe. What is the use of your fretting, Oh child of God, about food? "Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them." And will he take care of the sparrow, will he take care of the raven, will he take care of the hawk, and let you die? What is the use of your fretting about clothes? "Consider the lilies of the field. Shall he not make more clothe you, Oh ye of little faith? What is the use worrying for fear something will happen to your home? He that blesseth the habitation of the just." What is the use of your fretting lest you will overcome of temptations? "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but with temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." Oh, the King's highway! Trees of life on either side, bending over until their branches interlock and drop midway their fruitful shade. Houses of entertainment on either side the road for poor pilgrims. Tables spread with a feast of good things, walls adorned with apples of gold in purses of silver. I start out on this King's highway, and I find a harper, and I say, "What is your name?" The harper makes no response, but leaves me to guess, with his eyes toward heaven and his hand upon the trembling strings this tune cor rippling on the air: "The Lord is my life and my salvation. Whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life. Whom shall I be afraid?" I go a little farther on the same road and meet a trumpeter of heaven, and I say, "Haven't you some music for a tired pilgrim?" A wiping his lip and taking a long breath he puts his mouth to the trumpet: "pours forth this strain: 'They shall hunger no more, neither shall they thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat, for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.'" I go a little distance farther on the same road, and I meet a maiden of Israel. She has no harp, but she has cymbals. She looks as if they had rusted from sea-spray and I say to the maiden of Israel: "Have you no song for a tired pilgrim?" A like the clang of victors' shields the cymbals clap as Miriam begins to discourse: "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and the rider he has thrown into the sea." And then I see a white-robed group. They come bounding toward me, and I say, "Who are the happiest, and the brightest, and the fairest in all heaven—who are they?" And the answer comes: "These are the who came out of great tribulations, a ad their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

I pursue this subject only one step further. What is the terminus? I do not know how fine a road you put me on, I want to know where it comes out. My next declares it: "The redeemed of the Lord come to Zion." You know what Zion was. That was the King's palace. It was a mountain fastness. It was impregnable. And so heaven is the fastness of the universe. No howitzer has long enough range to shell those towers. Let all the batteries of earth and hell blaze away; they cannot break in those gates. Gibraltar was taken, Sebastopol was taken, Babylon fell; but these walls of heaven shall never surrender either to human or Satanic besiegement. The Lord God Almighty is the defence of it. Great capital of the universe! Terminus of the King's highway!

Dr. Dick said that, among other things, he thought in heaven we would study chemistry, and geometry, and conic sections. Southey thought that in heaven we would have the pleasure of seeing Chaucer and Shakespeare. Now, Dr. Dick may have his mathematics for all eternity, and Southey his Shakespeare. Give me Christ and my old friends—that all the heaven I want. Christ and his people that I knew on earth—that is heaven enough for me. O, garden of light, whose leaves never wither, and whose fruits never fail! O, banquet of God, whose sweetness never palls the taste and whose guests are kings for ever! O, city of light, whose walls are salvation, and whose gates are praise! O, palace of rest, here God is the monarch and everlasting ages the length of his reign!

O, glorious heaven! When the last sound is healed, when the last heart-break is ended, when the last tear of earthly sorrow is wiped away, and when we are redeemed of the Lord shall come to Zion, then let all the harpers take down their harps, and all the trumpeters take down their trumpets, and all across heaven let there be chorus of morning stars, chorus of white-robed victors, chorus of martyrs from under the throne, chorus of worlds, and there is but one song sung, and but one name spoken, and but one throne honored—that of Jesus only.

A Solitary Christian.

IN the course of a letter from Dr. J. Davis, of Japan, he relates the following incident of his work: At Tsugiga-oka we were welcomed in the home of Mr. Uchimaki, one of the most prominent men in that region. The family consists of the father and mother, now over sixty years old, and four sons. The second son came to Kyoto a few years ago to study medicine. While here he became interested in Christianity, was baptized and received into the church. About two years ago he became ill with lung trouble and went home. What should he do? To one of his family at home, and no one in the village had ever heard of Christianity, except to despise it. But he did not hide his light under a bushel, but set it up so that all could see it, and the result is that the whole house has been enlightened by it. He died in his mountain home, but a few months before his death one of his brothers, who had heard the truth from him, went over the mountains thirty miles to Ayabe and received baptism. When the man died the question arose what kind of a funeral they should give. The family had been Buddhists and the priests came to officiate, but the family declined, and determined to have a Christian funeral. But the snow was still deep upon the mountains, and the nearest pastor or evangelist was thirty or forty miles away. It took four days to get a coffin to them; the body could not be kept long, so the family and friends tenderly laid the loved form to rest in the grave without any ceremony at all, and waited week till two pastors came over the snow and held the funeral services in the home, which was filled with the neighbors. The next morning after our arrival, the old father and mother, also another son and his wife, were examined for admission into the church.

attend the sad ceremony. They brought flowers and floral crosses and wreaths in profusion. More than one such offering, as they frankly admitted, had involved a previous visit to a pawnbroker, but when a stranger was showing kindness to the dead, they were in no grudging mood. There was a simple service and a tender appeal to all to quit the paths of sin, and assurances of help to any who might need it in returning to virtuous life. Then the last farewell kisses were imprinted on the unconscious lips, and with tears the women went their way.

It was an appropriate place for such a service. Compassion for the victims of sin was the spirit in which it had its origin. The man who founded it, like the woman in the Gospels, loved much, because he had been forgiven much. His own experience had taught him the power of Christ to raise the fallen and he looked on the most degraded as being, by their very degradation, eligible for the benefits of that power. Thirty-three years ago, Jerry McAuley was a common thief, a drunkard and a prize-fighter, just released from Sing Sing. His father was a counterfeiter and had been familiar with vice and crime from his infancy. Even the saloon-keepers and the lawless element in Water Street dreaded his return to his old haunts. Reckless, quarrelsome, dissipated, he had been the terror of the neighborhood, which at that time was not fastidious about the habits of the people, nor was easily shocked by excesses. But Jerry had been away for over seven years and he was not wanted back. When he did return, he came as a messenger of peace.

The story of Jerry's conversion has often redeeming love. But the work was not suffered to stop. It was not easy to find a successor to Jerry McAuley, but one was found in the person of Mr. S. H. Hadley, who had the same unwavering faith in the power of Christ to save and had tested it in his own person. He had gone two years before, a drunken gambler, into Jerry's meeting and had been led under the influence of Jerry's appeals and prayers to put his trust in Christ. He had experienced the same results and could tell the story of personal reclamation and deliverance that Jerry had told.

Neither eloquence nor learning was needed in Water street, but strong faith, clear testimony and love for souls. These Mr. Hadley had, and on the invitation of the trustees of the Mission, he entered on the work. The results have justified the choice. The meetings in the old Mission are conducted on the old lines. Drunkards, criminals and dissolute people are the kind most welcome within those doors, as they were in the former time. Mr. Hadley is like a physician who knows that his sphere is with the sick; it is the sick that he wants to reach. The desperate cases, those who have no hope and of whom no one else has any hope, are the kind to whom he preaches a Saviour who promises to cast out none who come to him.

The attendance at the meetings of the Mission aggregates fifty thousand in the course of a year, and the bulk of them belong to the drunken and criminal classes. On Saturday nights, through the kindness of friends of the Mission, Mr. Hadley is able to give his guests a meal, and thus prove to them that sympathy is not limited to words. It is sometimes necessary to do still more. Some of the men who go there are utterly homeless and destitute. As far as his funds will allow, Mr. Hadley comes to their relief. In the upper rooms of the mission there are accommodations for some fifteen or twenty men, and if a man shows a desire to reform, he is sheltered and cared for. Thus the good work of rescuing the fallen, begun by Jerry McAuley twenty-three years ago, is still carried on in name of the Friend of Sinners.

WAITING ADMISSION TO THE SATURDAY EVENING SUPPER IN WATER STREET.

briefly. A beautiful girl, living a vicious life, had become despondent, and ended her existence by taking poison. The body lay in the room where she died, and would probably be buried in the Potter's Field. That was likely, for though the girl had relatives in the city, she had disgraced them and they had cast her off. The men who knew her had no further interest in her, and would not be disposed to pay funeral expenses. So the Potter's Field seemed to be the probable destination of the corpse. But her companions, women like she had been, were distressed by the thought, and out of their wretched resources, raised a few dollars toward giving their old friend decent Christian burial. Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Hadley, who conduct the Water Street Mission, heard of their effort, and sympathizing with it, and especially with the spirit that prompted it, offered to make up what was lacking, and to allow the funeral services to be held in the Mission. The body was put in a decent coffin and taken to the Mission; and that night the dead girl's friends came to been told. Water Street did not know the new man as it saw him. There was the old intensity of purpose, the old restless energy, but the man was changed. He still sought the society of the lowest and most degraded, but it was that he might lift them out of the mire. None were so low that he would not give them fellowship. It was not with the righteous, but with sinners that his business was. He sought them in his old haunts, told them how he had been saved, and assured them that they might be saved in the same way. One after another was saved through his efforts, until friends, who learned what he was doing, helped him to open the Mission that now bears his name. He held meetings every night, and many a despairing creature lost to society, and without hope in this world or the next, was encouraged to follow Jerry's example. Many a soul was saved in that room.

In 1884 the worker to whom so many owed their rescue from ruin was called away. Death hushed the voice that had never ceased to tell the wondrous story of

The Chinese War and Missions.

It is now evident that the recent Chinese-Japanese war will ultimately have a good effect on missionary work in the former country at least. One result is the issuing of a decree giving the emperor's sanction to the building of a railway along the Grand Canal from Peking to a point near Nanking. The road will be about fifteen hundred miles long, and by its connections will furnish the means of reaching the interior of Manchuria. It will also connect with the Russian Transcontinental Railway. The scheme has met with general approval from the officials. Another result of the war will be a university and preparatory school at Tientsin, with Chinese and foreign teachers, and a former American missionary as president. Preparations to this end had already been made; but the recent events will doubtless make a success of what threatened to be a failure. To some extent under the management of the university, preparatory schools will be established in north China.

The Great Helper.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 16. Luke 7: 2-15. Golden Text, Luke 7: 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OD is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble" (Ps. 46: 1). Jesus, the Son of God, and the express image of his Person (Heb. 1: 3), was as Man amongst men in the limited area to which his incarnation confined him, a refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble to all the needy ones with whom his Father brought him in contact. Sickness, sorrow, death itself fled before him, and the effect of his wondrous works was such that "there came a fear on all; and they glorified God, saying, That a great Prophet has risen up among us; and, That God hath visited his people. And this rumor of him went forth throughout all Judea, and throughout all the region round about" (v. 16). Yet the very people among whom his mightiest works were done, crucified their Prophet, and denied the visitation of God which they had proclaimed, because the same Jesus who healed and wrought miracles, taught also the unwelcome lesson of the cross, and the utter nothingness of the flesh.

Jesus taught and healed; healed and taught. Now another part of his ministry awaited him. "He entered into Capernaum," and very soon he was in request: "A certain centurion's servant [or slave] who was dear unto him, was sick, and ready to die." This heathen official, a Roman soldier, belonging to the most arrogant people then on the face of the earth, was so impressed with what he had heard of Jesus, that he shrank from intruding his own presence upon the great Healer, but sought the mediation of the elders of the Jews. They, little understanding the spirit of the man or the spirit of the Master, began to recommend the centurion by flattery, saying "that he was worthy for whom he should do this: for he loveth our nation, and he has built us a synagogue." Poor human nature, which thinks there is anything in what it is, or what it can do, to recommend it to God! Jesus made no comment. "He knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man: for he knew what was in man." (John 2: 24, 25.)

The centurion seems to have been aware of the action of the elders of the Jews, and as Jesus was "now not far from the house, the centurion sent friends" with the message: "Lord, trouble not thyself; for I am not worthy that thou shouldst enter under my roof; wherefore neither thought I myself worthy to come unto thee: but say in a word, and my servant shall be healed. For I also am a man set under authority, having under me soldiers, and I say unto one, Go and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it." As though to say, if I, in my little sphere can speak and be obeyed, how should not thou, who hast such manifest power over sickness, speak but a word and the thing shall be done? The centurion took in the position: He valued Jesus at an estimation far beyond that at which the elders of the Jews valued him. In his eyes Jesus was first, and should be first considered. The centurion honored the Lord; Jesus gained in him a valuable disciple and his heart was

But oh, how touching are the words: "When Jesus heard these things, he marvelled at him." Why should it be a marvel that Jesus should be honored? Why should it be a marvel that God's own Son should be considered by the creatures whom he has made? Why should it be a any difficulty? "As thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee." (Matt. 8: 13), was no hard answer to the centurion. And Jesus "turned him about, and said unto him: I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." May not one of the great hindrances to healing be that so many think they are worthy, and they fail to appreciate Jesus? They want to serve themselves of him, instead of letting him serve himself of them. Like Herod, they expect to see some sign done by Jesus, while they silence him who testifies to Jesus; and it cannot be. The friends of the centurion and the elders of the Jews, returning to the centurion's house, found that he had not overrated the power and willingness of Jesus, they "found the servant whole which had been sick."

"The next day [or R. V., soon after] he went into a city called Nain;" he was now at the very height of his popularity, "and many of his disciples went with him, and much people." Had they learned the lesson which he sought to teach at Nazareth, and which he repeated here: that Israel needed to be taught by Gentiles and strangers that faith in their Messiah which they lacked. We hear that a woman of Sarepta, not one of Israel's daughters, must prove the truth of God's promises to the widow; a Syrian general, and not a son of Israel, must learn the healing power of Jehovah Rokeha; and now a Roman centurion must manifest a faith which was not to be found in Israel! Yet we do not read that the people took these things to heart; they saw his miracles, they did eat of the loaves so miraculously multiplied, but nevertheless, they crucified their Lord!

When Jesus was come "nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow; and much people was with her." No appeal was made to Jesus; as yet he had not raised the dead. But as the "very present help in trouble," how could he ignore the widow when so many promises in the Old Testament are made expressly to the widow? "He had compassion on her." Nothing was a matter of course to Jesus; everything was significant; his Father had a will about all, and that Father, dwelling in him, loved the desolate widow. Jesus "had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not." Oh, how many say the same thing to one who is stricken and sorrowful! But the words come upon the heart, which knows its own bitterness, as the inter-meddling of a stranger (Prov. 14: 10); neither relief from suffering nor power are in them, and silence would be more really helpful. Unless we can bring help from above to the sorrowing, some word from God which brings light into the darkness; an understanding of the purposes of a faithful Father in his mysterious dealings with his child, it is a cruel impertinence to say, "Weep not."

But the Son of man came through death "to destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. 2: 14);

he knew his vocation, and now he "came near and touched the bier, and the bearers stood still." What was about to happen? Surely that company must have held their breath when he who only yesterday had commanded sickness to depart, and it departed, now opened his lips in the presence of the dead. "Young man," he said, "I say unto thee, Arise." And the stiff, cold corpse was instinct with animation, and in spite of the winding sheet and the narrow limits of the bier, the young man "sat up and began to speak, and he delivered him to his mother." This first resurrection by the Lord Jesus produced a deep impression; the last the resurrection of Lazarus, led to his apprehension and death. Why was this? There lay between, the teachings of his own death and sufferings, the lesson of the cross and all it involved, the ruin and corruption of human nature.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AFTER the sermon on the Mount, Jesus appears to have returned to Capernaum as he continued to do after his preaching excursions, making it his home for the brief periods of rest he allowed himself. The twelve doubtless accompanied him. How long after his arrival it was before the application from the Centurion came we are not told. Probably very soon after, a deputation of the chief people of the place came to ask a favor of him, on behalf of the Centurion, a man holding a position in the Roman garrison equivalent to that of Captain in modern armies. He commanded a company of a hundred men, hence the name. We infer that he was stationed permanently at Capernaum, as he built the synagogue there. The Jews regarded him as a public benefactor, and urged Jesus, on that ground, to relieve him of his trouble. Incidentally, we get a light on the man's character from his concern about his servant's sickness. In those days employers were not, as a rule, apt to worry very much about the health of their servants, who were practically slaves. We gather, therefore, that the Centurion was a kindly man, as well as a religious man. The two characteristics ought always to go together, so that if we hear of a man being religious, we may be sure that he is kind to those around him. His own message, when some one running on before, told him that Jesus was coming, sheds another light on his character. He had strong faith in Christ. There was no need for him to come, the Centurion practically says. Disease obeyed Christ as slaves obeyed the Centurion. Jesus had only to give the word, and he was sure that would be sufficient. Jesus promptly recognizes and rewards such faith. He was always ready to do this. Nothing seemed to please him so much as to have people believe in him. The man was healed, not because of his own faith, but because of his master's. This is an encouragement to intercessory prayer now. If any one wants a blessing for another, there is ground in this incident for confidence in making the appeal.

"Young Man, I say unto thee, Arise."

The second miracle in the lesson was one of pure compassion. No appeal to Christ appears to have been made. He was starting on another preaching tour and was approaching Nain, a town about twenty-five miles from Capernaum, where he met this sad funeral procession. Instantly his pity was stirred and with a word of sympathy to the bereaved mother and of command to the unconscious corpse he restored the young man to life. Many interesting questions are suggested by the miracle. Where was the young man's soul, that Jesus could recall it? This and other cognate questions will be asked, but they cannot be satisfactorily answered. To allow the attention to be diverted to them is to fall into the mistake which, on the part of the Jews of Christ's day, caused him distress. He was pained because they were so intent on the miracle that they failed to see the purpose for which the miracle was worked. To us, the wonder of a miraculous healing or the raising of the dead, is an amazing, extraordinary thing; but if we knew as much as Jesus did of the spiritual world, we should regard conversion as something much more wonderful and momentous. If the people instead of being wrapped up in the miracle had said that the Man who can do this can give us spiritual and eternal life and had asked him to do that for them Jesus would have been content. But to see them interested like children in the miracle, and heedless about the great lesson of the miracle, was disappointing. We must be careful not to make the same mistake. Curiosity is out of place here; we should be seeking at Christ's hands the gift of eternal life, and the miracle serve its purpose if it convinces us that he who could work it has the power to give the greater blessing.

Ready to die. They meant that he was near death, but there is another meaning to the phrase which should not be overlooked. A widowed mother was trying to explain to her little girl the death of the child's father. She said that God had taken him. "Shall we never see him again?" the child asked. "Yes," said the mother, "God will send for us sometime and then we shall see him." "When?" was the next question. The mother replied, "I do not know; it may be soon or not for years." The child considered a minute and said: "Well, Mamma, we ought to be always ready to go, had we not? If we don't know when he will send, we had better see to it at once, so we may not be hurried at the time."

A man set under authority. That is invested with authority by some one higher than himself. The centurion regarded Jesus as possessing authority in the spiritual world like that exercised by himself as a Roman officer in the social world. The idea of disease being a messenger under orders from God has long been familiar one. Ancient history tells of a merchant who lost his all in a storm at sea, in which his vessels laden with merchandise foundered. The merchant went to Athens to study philosophy, having capital to resume business. He was happy in his studies that he was thankful for his losses. "If I had not lost my fortune," he said, "I had not gained that which is better than fortune." A man whom a gay companion went to condo with him on his long sickness, astonished his visitor by saying: "Sympathy, my dear friend? No, I want congratulation. This sickness was a messenger from God to tell me I was wasting my life in drinking and revelling, and was going to ruin. God kindly sent the sickness to caution me. I have listened to his messenger and am saved."

Young man I say unto thee Arise. "I was foremost in all evil," writes a man no eminent for piety and usefulness; "I hate everything good. I was deaf to all appeal. Drink, gambling and all vices held me in their grasp. As soon as the office in which I was employed was closed at night I used to hurry to some scene of revelry and spend the hours till after midnight. I used to call it pleasure, but it grew loathsome. I felt that I was a wreck, degraded, debased, brutalized. A good man put his hand on my shoulder, one day and said: 'Would you not like to be a man instead of a beast?' I looked at him in amazement; but I now see that his words were the turning-point. Under his guidance I went to Christ, renounced sin and began to live. I am as great a wonder myself in having risen out of the mire as I would be if I had been dead and had risen out of my coffin."

ARMENIA'S GLEAM OF HOPE.

Her Despairing Eyes now Turned Toward Russia for Defence against Further Massacres—Recent Butcheries and Martyrdoms—Urgent Need of Vigorous Relief Work.

MOSLEM fanaticism and cruelty are still actively engaged in the great work of Armenian extermination. Each passing week brings its quota of sad intelligence of new outrages and massacres in the distracted provinces of Asia Minor. Letters from Constantinople state that up to the present time, sixteen Armenian Protestant pastors, all of whom refused to abjure Christ and accept Islam, have died the death of martyrs. In the provinces of Aleppo and Adana, the lives of the entire Christian population are threatened. At the town of Amasia, Bekir Pasha, the Mutessarif, by almost superhuman efforts, prevented a massacre and plundering. Another brave official, the Kaimakam of Vezir-Kopou, while endeavoring to resist a fanatical Turkish mob, was overpowered. He telegraphed for troops and succeeded in stopping the slaughter, but fifty Christians had already been killed. These are isolated instances where, fortunately the worst was averted, but in a majority of cases, the Turks, Kurds, and Circassians carried through the bloody programme of slaughter, violation, fire, and pillage unhindered, and indeed with the fullest approval of the officials whose operations were directed from Constantinople.

Letters from survivors of the massacres, who have succeeded in reaching places of safety, continue to be received, and each letter discloses some new and revolting trait of Moslem ferocity and hatred against Christianity. One letter declares that five hundred square miles of beautiful and diversified country have been swept with a besom of destruction. Many well-to-do Armenian families, who had gathered their money and valuables together, anticipating the storm, and who sought, by paying them to Turkish and Kurdish neighbors, to secure protection, were not only despoiled of all their property, but suffered death as well. This writer continues:

But, passing by the unprovoked and pitiless slaughter of from 1,000 to 10,000 Armenians, largely the well-to-do, capable men, the merciless plundering of the Armenian shops, stores and houses, and the multitudes of Christian girls and married women, whose husbands have been slain or were away from home, who have been forced to become the wives of Turks, in less than three months' time, whole districts, which for more than fourteen centuries have been occupied with Christian homes, have been made to assume the appearance of a Mohammedan land. Such is the fate to which thousands of Armenian Christians, with husbands, fathers and sons slain, in utter beggary and despair have been reduced. And this is the situation in which Christian Europe, and especially England, leaves their Armenian fellow-Christians. Is it not a most gross betrayal?

A veritable crusade of Mohammedan fanaticism rules the hour. The Kurds and Circassians are tolerably sated with plunder, but the Turks in various provinces, with Saracenic cruelty, are compelling the wretched survivors to accept the hated religion of their murderous oppressors. Eleven Protestant preachers in the region of Harpoot, one pastor in Arabkir, one pastor in Sivas, several priests and many Armenian Christians—men and women—have distinctly chosen death rather than Islam, and have been mercilessly slain. Many other Armenian Christians, however, have been solemnly threatened that they have professed themselves Mohammedans en masse, in the hope that subsequently Christian Europe would deliver them from the dreadful yoke. Thus whole villages and towns and whole Christian quarters in cities have been driven, like helpless sheep, into the Moslem fold.

A private letter brings news of the betrayal and plundering of the Armenian village of Dendil, near Gemarek, by Turks, Circassians, and Kurds. The villagers were persuaded to lay down their arms and trust for defence to the neighboring Moslem village of Suzil, whose people basely betrayed them. Women and girls were outraged, and all the Armenian houses plundered. The village of Tekman, nearby, was seven times plundered. Ali Agha, a Turk, who had already shown friendship to the Armenians, alone prevented a general massacre. Rev. Dr. Wingate, a missionary, has gone to Gemarek, Tekman, Dendil, and Boorhan with food and clothing supplied by the Relief Fund.

Amid all the desolation and woe, one gleam of hope for Armenia appears, although it may yet prove illusive. It is announced that Russia and Turkey have concluded an alliance offensive and defensive, which will have the effect of reducing Turkey to the position of a vassal state, giving Russia complete control of the Bosphorus, and, inferentially, also giving the Czar the right, if he desires at any time to do so, to march Russian troops into Armenia. This rumored alliance is said to be based on an old agreement entered into between the same countries in 1833, under which the Dardanelles were to be closed to the enemies of Russia in case of war. True or false, the rumor has violently agitated Europe, and the probable effect of such a treaty on the peace of a generous sums which you have been able to remit. I can speak beforehand for those at Erzeroom, Erzincjan, Harpoot, Diarbekir, Mardin, Gemarek, Aintab, Sivas, and Arabkir, to whom now considerable means have been sent by your hand. I trust the good work will continue, and that it may be your privilege to greatly increase the relief thus attempted by the hands of our missionaries. A more appalling disaster has not befallen any people in many years, and there seems to be no source from which relief can more properly come than from our own prosperous, happy land. The missionaries are all delighted to do their utmost in distributing the relief."

A letter received in New York from an Armenian resident on the sea-coast of Cilicia, says:

"The Government has taken away all the arms from the Armenians of Chok Marsovan, who were armed to protect themselves against 15,000 Bashi-Bazouks, who were marching on them. Since then the Turks have reduced to ashes the villages of Engerli and Ojakli, which contained respectively 300 and 250 houses. They have plundered seventy-five houses in the Armenian village of Najarli. They set on fire the houses in the presence of the regular soldiers. Now all the villagers are reduced to the utmost distress. More than 100 farms have been plundered, and many people butchered in the houses and in the gardens. The government of Ardini have falsely telegraphed that peace and order have been restored in this vicinity.

That the Sultan is unalterably resolved to refuse recognition to the Red Cross or to permit it as an organization to enter Armenia is evident from a recent cable dispatch in which he declines to admit any organization for relief distribution. This refusal has no reference to the American Board missionaries who are engaged in the distribution of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund. They have been at their present mission posts for periods ranging from three to ten and even fifteen years, and, besides, are acting as individual agents in the relief work, which they have carried forward thus far with remarkable success and without involving any serious friction with the Turkish authorities.

Resolutions looking to the protection of American citizens in Turkey and asking Europe to act for the prevention of further bloodshed in Armenia have been adopted in both houses of Congress.

While the Armenian persecutions have brought to light many heroes and martyrs, there are thousands of others who have perished in the massacres, whose names deserve to be recorded with those godly men and women who, at different periods of the world's history, have gladly yielded up their lives for the faith. Their heroism has elicited from the missionaries the warmest admiration. Many times, too, have the missionaries themselves been in peril, and on such occasions, when their lives seemed hardly worth a moment's purchase, their fortitude has been stimulated by the simple courage of the native Christians around them.

Not one of the American missionaries deserted his post, not even one of the women missionaries. At Harpoot, the bullets fell thick around them, but they were divinely protected; at Marash, the lady missionaries stood bravely in front of their students in the college, ready to die, if the call came; but they were unharmed. "I thought our time had come," wrote one worthy missionary, afterward, and he added, "and if we were to lay down our lives there, we felt that we would not have chosen it otherwise." But they were preserved for still further duty in the Lord's vineyard, and it is largely due to their humane efforts to-day that any relief work is being done in Armenia at all.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is advised by a letter direct from the field that, for the next month at least, the need will be most urgent. Midwinter has been reached, and many lives have already been saved through the Fund, but to extend relief in quarters where it is just now imperatively needed, necessitates an increase of the Fund's resources.

It is a work that has been laid upon them in the same spirit which moved the Master when he walked on earth feeding the hungry, healing the sick, and comforting the sorrowful. Such a work, we are confident will not be neglected at the hands of the Christian men and women of America. Further remittances from the Fund have been sent to Harpoot and Palu. Contributions to the Fund during the week are acknowledged on page 114 of this issue.

A Great Opportunity.

Rev. Dr. Talmage's book, The Pathway of Life, has been heretofore one of the premiums given to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers, but the stock having now been entirely exhausted, and our arrangements with the publishers being at an end, and not renewable, we can fill no more orders for that particular book, which has proved remarkably popular with our readers, over 75,000 having been taken. There are still left a limited number of copies of Dr. Talmage's other and most famous work: From Manger to Throne, and while these last, one copy each will be sent to new subscribers who will send in a six months' subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with this premium. When it is once exhausted, this premium cannot be renewed.

ARMENIAN VILLAGERS OF VAN PROVINCE, NEAR THE PERSIAN BORDER.

Continent is widely discussed. If true, it may be the means of solving the Armenian question by a Russian occupation, and thus restoring peace to that unfortunate country, and a measure of protection to its persecuted people.

From various points in Asia Minor, letters have come picturing in the most touching terms, the scenes of misery and destitution that prevail in the provinces of Armenia. All tell the same story, substantially, but with infinite varieties—the sudden descent of the armed Kurds, the ruthless slaughter of men, the abduction and abusing of tender women and girls, and the cruel immolation of innocent little children. Then the pitiful case of the survivors, naked, homeless, and starving. Fortunately the relief measures now at work are accomplishing much toward reducing the misery in some of the cities. The various stations opened by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund with the money generously contributed by its readers, are all doing energetic service, and the good missionaries are distributing relief without the slightest molestation or interference from Turkish officials.

Rev. Judson Smith, Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, writes of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund distribution in Armenia:

"We all feel that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD deserves the warmest commendation for the systematic and generous way in which it has sought to bring relief to the distressed in that happy land. Our missionaries there, and especially at Van, have already expressed to you their gratitude for your endeavors, and for the very

ity. After the restoration of the so-called order, seventy Armenians were killed in the presence of the Mutessarif of Jebel and other officials. The Turks have killed the sexton of the church at Chok Marsovan, and turned the church into a barracks for soldiers. The troops are still torturing the innocent Armenians, and asking for more arms. They are trying to collect taxes from people who have nothing, and who are unable even to support their own families."

The massacres have now been going on actively in Armenia for over sixteen months, dating from the terrible slaughter at Sassoun in August and September 1894. In a recent letter published in the London Times, a well-informed correspondent says: "A low estimate of those either killed, or now in a state of actual starvation, is half the agricultural population of seven vilayets—275,000, according to Turkish statistics, two-thirds of the starving being women and children. The government is completing its work in the vilayets by reducing the population and the remaining property under the forms of martial law, and by forcing the Armenians to declare themselves Mohammedans. Many have died for their faith, and the greater number are still holding out, dying by inches."

Turkish estimates, which, as can be readily understood, do not magnify the massacres, give the following as the net result of the sanguinary work up to the middle of December:

Armenians killed by the Turks	100,000
Armenians killed by Kurds and Circassians	50,000
Armenians killed by the Armenians	10,000
Armenians killed by the Persians	5,000
Villages destroyed	2,500
Number reduced to starvation in villages	366,600

CHRISTIAN WORK IN NEW ORLEANS.

The Union Gospel Mission and its Labors Among the Non-churchgoers—Consecrated Workers Banded to "Rescue the Perishing."

SEVERAL years ago, a small number of Christian men, some of whom had already been successfully engaged in the service of the Master, and all drawn together by an intense desire to help fallen humanity, founded the Union Gospel Mission in the city of New Orleans. They builded better than they knew, for their work has been greatly blessed and increased, so that to-day the Mission is a potent factor in the moral well-being of that city. Its founders are Messrs. E. A. Vail, who is also its General Manager; H. Bein, the Superintendent of the Sunday School, and H. N. Harrison. The latter, however, has been in active religious work in another field for several years. At its inception, it had associated with its Young Children's side of the work, Mrs. Anna Girard, a most consecrated Christian, who died some years ago. Her place has been filled by Mrs. M. B. Hillyard, who, as Superintendent of the infant school, has, for years been performing the arduous labors of that position, with unflagging zeal and holy usefulness. Upon her has devolved the leadership in the numerous public religious entertainments, which have been given in order to endear the Sunday School to the children, to broaden its usefulness and attract scholars, and which have made the Mission School conspicuous in New Orleans. This lady has organized the Juvenile Temperance Band, a body of young children who take a pledge of abstinence from intoxicants and tobacco, and whose conduct would furnish many instructive and pathetic incidents, had we space to narrate them.

The work of the Mission began on April 20, 1890, in open-air meetings. It started in a neighborhood strongly tinctured with Romanism, and, between the hostility they encountered, and the disorderliness of the unruly auditors, the meetings, at one time, were well-nigh abandoned. However, through God's help, the work won its way to the heart of the neighborhood: rancors were appeased, former bitter opponents ceased their mischief and machinations, and the Mission now has many friends among those who were once inimical, and the school numbers among its attendants many children of Catholic parents, who have learned to appreciate and love whoever feeds their hungry, clothes their naked, sheds the tear of pity at their sorrow, prays at the bedside of their dying loved ones. The brotherhood of Christ has awakened a brotherhood of mankind, and gentle pity has become the solvent of a once bitter and proscriptive sectarianism.

The organization of the Union Gospel Mission originated with Mr. E. A. Vail, who has been for thirteen years in work of this character. He is a converted bar-keeper, and owes his awakening to a narrow escape from shipwreck in a storm on Lake Ponchartrain one Sunday, fourteen years ago, when he and a number of companions had gone on a fishing party, in Saturday forenoon. In the midst of the storm, he vowed to God that if he would let him reach land in safety, he would forsake his wicked life. His escape from drowning, and he was faithful to his vow. He sought and obtained pardon, went to work at the construction of ship carpentering, and was carried in good living. But his zeal and consecration spurred him into exclusively religious work, and his life is now devoted entirely to it, renouncing all thought of secular work, and gladly incurring the pains and manifold privations incident to poverty. What has been accomplished was at a cost of much sacrifice on the part of Mr. Vail and his associates. It seems as though God had specially ordained and fitted some of these Christian workers for this special field, for it takes brave hearts for such hardships as have beset their lot. Not only have delicate ladies gone shoeless, and sick ones without medicine in this work, but the amount of la-

Among one of the many-sided aspects of the Mission, is the attendance of its leading workers at the city jail every Sunday morning, where regular religious services of preaching, prayer, and song are held from 9.30 to 11 A. M., under the conduct of Mr. H. Bein, the joint representative for such occasions of the Young Men's Christian Association of New Orleans and the Union Gospel Mission. There, for some time, every Sunday morning, from twenty-five to fifty copies of the New Testament or the Gospels were distributed, until the supply was exhausted. For over a year not a copy has been given to the prisoners, although many sorely need them. "In many cases," said one of the mission managers, "we can see the fruits of our work at the morning service in the jail: hearts and eyes melted in penitence; sinners converted; fallen women rescued, and homes provided for them. Boys are sent home to distracted parents and good is done to the unfortunate criminal class in many other ways."

The workers also watch in sickness, console the bereaved and the dying, hold prayer meetings at the call of the sick and infirm, procure the release of penitent and deserving prisoners, and find them employment. Their aim is to serve and honor the Lord, and to relieve suffering.

and poor. There is no discrimination. If the Union Gospel Mission had a shelter for some of them, it might take them in for a day or two, give them a warm bed, and a word of Christian love and pity. The cost of the necessary buildings is estimated at about $10,000, which would include all that is required to make the Mission efficient in every part of its present field.

It should be stated that the Union Gospel Mission is distinctly undenominational. Those who are rescued, under its auspices, from lives of sin and induced to lead a new life, join the Christian church of their choice. Its workers, who are banded to rescue the perishing, belong to various denominations; Protestant Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian and Baptist.

The work of the Mission is heartily endorsed by all these denominations as the following testimonial shows:

We, the undersigned take pleasure in testifying to the energy and usefulness of the Union Gospel Mission, and cordially commend it to the sympathy and helpful patronage of all evangelical sects. Signed: JOHN T. SAWYER, Pastor Louisiana Ave. M. E. Church; CHAS. A. H. LAMM, Pastor 3d Presbyterian Church; GEO. S. HASTON, Pastor St. Charles Ave. M. E. Church; WM. H. LA PRADÉ, Pastor Calondelet St. M. E. Church; JAMES S. SHERRARD, Gen. Secretary Y. M. C. A.; W. C. BLACK, Editor New Orleans Christian Advocate; D. I. PURSER, Pastor Baptist Church; A. GORLON BAKEWELL, Pastor Trinity Chapel.

The present quarters of the Union Gospel Mission are at No. 1 Keller Row, in the rear of the city, in a very humble neighborhood. Regular services are held on Sunday and on Tuesday and Friday nights. It has no salaried workers and depends wholly upon the approval of God's people for means to prosecute the work, which is one of faith exclusively. Thus far the confidence of its conductors has been fully justified, and they look forward to a future of still greater activity in the Lord's vineyard and to the inbringing of many precious souls.

An Ohio Christian Lady's Work

Four months ago, Mrs. Sherman, a Christian lady of Ashtabula, O., started a Sailor's Mission at Columbus and Bridge streets in that city, which is a large or coal-shipping port. In summer, boats to the number of thirty to forty are in port simultaneously. She started the mission in the slums, and forty drunken and vicious men have since been converted. She often finds men without Bibles or Testaments; she could use to advantage a number of old or second-hand Bibles in her work, together with other religious literature. She also does Christian work in the lumber camps and in jails, and has already had much spiritual encouragement bor performed with the means supplied has been something surprising, as the following extracts from a recent report show: The mission has been run for four years on a little more than $1,000. Most of this has been disbursed for rent. The total receipts and expenditures have been $1,347.44. Mr. Vail's work represents the distribution of 153,000 religious tracts, 2,130 Bibles and Testaments, 7,892 religious papers, 46 religious books. There have been held 678 services in the little Mission Chapel, at which there has been an attendance of 5,872; 96 open-air meetings, with an aggregate of 18,170 auditors; 256 visits made to the Parish Prison; 77 visits made to the sick; 438 pieces of clothing, hats, caps, and shoes distributed, and 100 house-to-house visits made.

As only a part of Mrs. H. B. Hillyard's work in about three years as Superintendent of the infant class, may be mentioned the following: Number of families visited, 208; number of visits to scholars, 406; number of religious conversations held with various parties visited, 201. Besides, there is a large list, unnoted, of sick members of the infant class visited. Her distribution of tracts for the past year has been very large. She can use to advantage any good religious literature which interested friends may send for the work.

THE TEMPERANCE BAND OF THE UNION GOSPEL MISSION, NEW ORLEANS, LA

In the performance of these duties by the Mission workers, frequent scenes of heart-melting pathos have been witnessed. They have had occasion to relieve many cases of destitution by the very poor of New Orleans and in this way have been able to bring a ray of comfort into many homes.

One of the aims of the Mission is to secure larger quarters in order to be able to extend its usefulness in various ways. It needs a home of its own, a chapel for religious services, quarters for its workers, and a temporary shelter for the needy, who often have to go to jail for no crime other than being poor. The Young Men's Christian Association has frequently protested against, and intervened in behalf of, cases of imprisonment for mere poverty. Sometimes the most touching instances of innocent suffering are found. Men of good character are immured for thirty days or more in squalor, filth, profanity, and crime, for being wet, hungry, friendless,

An Endeavor Society of One.

LOUIS SANFORD went thoughtfully home from church one Sunday, lately. The sermon had been on a high plane; the pastor had urged on every one a nobler ideal, a more consistent following of Christ. Louis was naturally self-indulgent and not inclined to put himself out, but somehow that day, Dr. Fair touched a chord which vibrated, and the sermon stuck by his young hearer.

"A Christian Endeavor Society of one!" The phrase lingered and returned to Louis, as sometimes the refrain of a song haunts the memory. He turned a corner, and went home by himself, not a bad thing to do on occasion, for many a sermon's influence is dissipated between the church and the home, by frivolous and inopportune talk, which removes the impression made by the pulpit.

"Louis," said his mother that afternoon, "are you going to your Bible Class? You have not attended very regularly, lately, I am afraid."

Louis was a clerk in a shoe store. His hours were long and he had little time to himself. He was extremely fond of reading, and it had gradually become more or less his habit to devote his Sunday afternoons to the magazines or some fascinating book. His teacher was beginning to fear that he meant to drop the class altogether, and his mother had shared the feeling.

Louis wavered; the volume of travels, not a bad book, and not altogether inappropriate for the Sabbath, since it told of missionary operations abroad, lay near his hand, and had never seemed more inviting. And the class had changed its membership largely. The old fellows were one by one dropping out, and the new set did not appeal to Louis. But, where was duty in the matter? If you belong to an organization are you not bound to stand by your colors? Have you the right to be half-hearted and perfunctory anywhere, and are you not pledged to be faithful wherever you set your name? The questions floated through Louis's mind, but he only said, with a resolute glance at the clock, as he took up his hat and cane, "I am going regularly this year, mother?"

So, a Christian Endeavor Society of one, he went swinging up the street at a brave pace, and it came to pass as he turned a corner, that he met Fred Delancy and Arthur James, who were starting off to the club-house, to see some friends, get their skates, and go to Central Park for the afternoon.

"Where are you going so fast, Louis?" asked Arthur.

"I? Oh! I'm going to Mrs. Ames. I've neglected the old class lately, and I've determined to turn over a new leaf. Come along, boys. You know how her eyes will light up if she sees three of us there to surprise her to-day."

"It will be a surprise and no mistake," answered Fred. "But I vote that we go. Mrs. Ames is jolly, and I used to like Sunday School well enough, though I've rather fallen out of the way of going."

So the Christian Endeavor Society of One, gained two recruits for the class, and did not hurt itself either.

Next evening, Katharine Sanford, Louis's sister, wished to call upon a friend, who lived several blocks off, and with whom Katharine had many things in common. Mrs. Sanford objected to her daughter's making calls after nightfall without an escort, and usually when she proposed anything of the kind, she had to give it up; for Louis, after the manner of many brothers, would say:

"Oh! go in the daytime. Sis. It's an awful bore to make calls when a man's tired after his day's work down-town; I simply can't go with you. If I do go out, I have an engagement in another direction."

Katharine was so accustomed to this sort of treatment, that she was delighted beyond measure when Louis at once and without demur assented to her proposal that they should go to Emmy Stuart's; and her mother, too, looked up with joy and approval, as Louis sweetly and pleasantly, with the courtesy of a true gentleman, went to his room to get ready. They did not know, you see, about the Christian Endeavor Society of One.

A day or two later, in the store, a man that Louis knew pretty well, came in, at a leisure half-hour just after luncheon, and in the course of conversation, spoke sneeringly of the Bible. He was one of those complain about. The trouble is very largely with ourselves, when the hour moves slowly and few take part, though we are apt to blame the leader, and throw the responsibility on the shoulders of the pastor, or the church committee, or the elders and deacons,—anywhere, indeed, except where it belongs, which is much nearer home.

The first prayer-meeting night after Louis's new resolution was a stormy one, and not one which allured a tired man to venture beyond his own doors. But Louis knew that the room would be open, that Dr. Fair would be present, and that neither snow nor sleet would be sufficient to prevent him from fulfilling any other engagement. So, without ado, he set off as the bells began to ring, his sister and brother Walter, who had meant to stay at home, quickly donning their outdoor garments and accompanying him. Arrived at the lecture-room, there was nobody to play the piano, the usual conductor being ill, and Katharine promptly took the vacant place; the Christian Endeavor Society of One again having saved a number of persons from disappointment and embarrassment.

It was, and is, the old story of the power of the unit. We are very prone, in this period, to magnify the influence of organizations, but the strongest organization depends on the fidelity of its membership, man by man. A single frayed link will break a treble-twisted rope. Would there were everywhere, Christian Endeavor Societies of One, to add to the beauty and strength of the noble association to which half-taught people, who, having gotten hold of certain catch-words, such as "verbal inspiration," "higher criticism," "modern scholarship" and the like, think they can overthrow the Bible with their penny pop-guns. But the old Book stands like Gibraltar, and never knows a shock from their assaults.

"I wish you wouldn't speak in that way," said Louis, "of the only perfect Book in the world. Till men can give us something better than God has given us in this line, they would best keep hands off."

The man was dumb with astonishment, but was impressed. Modest courage always wins its way. "I didn't know that Louis Sanford was that sort of a man," he said afterwards; "but I do remember now that he is a member of Dr. Fair's church, and I like to see a church member plucky enough to defend the Bible, whatever I think in the matter myself. You see, he may be right. My mother thinks the same way, and once in awhile, I do feel a little ashamed of fighting against my mother's Bible."

"Sanford's a fine fellow," said the other man. "Lately he's been more in earnest than he was awhile ago. I guess he's all right."

So the Christian Endeavor Society of One scored another triumph.

Louis Sanford was not very fond of going to prayer-meetings. He attended occasionally, but any slight excuse was sufficient to detain him on the appointed evening. Now, prayer-meetings are not always equally interesting. They sometimes lack enthusiasm, they have been known to drag. But if every one of us went to the meeting in a consecrated spirit, we would not generally have much to our chosen and beloved young men and women belong in consecrated bands.

Weariness.

"Lord, I am oppressed; undertake for me."
Isaiah 38: 14.

LORD, with a very tired mind
I seek thy face;
Thy shadowing wing alone can be
My resting-place.
Oh, let the everlasting arms,
Around me thrown,
My secret sanctuary be
From ills unknown.
Thou knowest, Lord, the hidden cross
None else may see;
For thou appointest every grief
That chastens me!
And I may plead with thee, my God,
For patient strength,
That this thy discipline of love
Bear fruit at length.

I need not fear to tell thee all,
My heavenly Friend,—
Of conflict, longing, vague unrest,—
Thou sett'st the end:
And thou wilt lead my weary feet
From world-worn ways,
Through paths of everlasting peace,
To calmer days.

Lord! dwell within my heart, and fill
Its emptiness;
Set thou its hope above the reach
Of earthliness;
Baptize its love, through suffering,
Into thine own,
And work in me a faith that rests
On Christ alone.

A LUNCHEON IN THE SNOW.

THE Russians are a great hunting nation. They love outdoor sports of all kinds and are well-nigh capable of enduring any fatigue. Among the nobility, hunting the bear, the deer and the wolf is a favorite pastime. On such occasions, it not infrequently happens that ladies accompany the hunters, and some of the grand dames of the Court at St. Petersburg are intrepid horsewomen, and daring cross-country riders. Our illustration on this page is reproduced from a photograph taken after a bear hunt near St. Petersburg, which was arranged by Prince Youssonoff for the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess Vladimir Alexandrovitch. The weather was intensely cold. The Grand Duke killed two bears, one weighing twelve and the other fourteen pounds. In the photograph, the Grand Duchess has to the right the French Ambassador, the Comte de Montebello, and to the left Prince Liechtenstein, the Austrian Ambassador; opposite to her is the Grand Duke, with the Princess Youssonoff on the right and Madame Paulucci on the left. Ordinarily, a luncheon in the snow, with the mercury down the freezing point, would hardly be considered an attractive affair, but the hardy hunters, fur-clad and booted, and warmed by exercise, make nothing of the weather. Indeed, they rather seem to enjoy it as it sharpens the appetite and gives a zest to the repast that is seldom found at a royal banquet.

A Missionary Heroine.

COL. J. A. COCKERILL, writing from Tokyo, Japan, to the New York Herald, tells the story of a noble Christian missionary, Miss Eliza Talcott, who has served the Master for twenty years in that country. She is the daughter of an American farmer, and began work as a missionary in Japan in 1873. Miss Talcott's place of work was Kobe, now a city of nearly a hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, then numbering about one-fifth as many, and here she became the organizer and head of the first Bible school opened by her mission, which has grown into the Kobe College, with well-appointed buildings.

After a time she turned the educational work over to others and devoted herself to work for women in Okayama, one hundred miles west of Kobe. Here she lived and worked for nearly ten years, and had no small part in helping to build up a large and strong church, besides doing good work in the country around. She was called away to Kyoto, where she had charge of the moral and religious training of the nurses and was a comforter and friend to the patients in the hospital, thus having a direct preparation for her work in the military hospitals at Hiroshima, where she went soon after the beginning of the war.

She is one of those Christians who would convince the most hardened unbeliever that there is a power in Christian faith, for her complete unselfishness and devotion to the good of others are evidently the fruit of her devotion to Christ, and the practical fruits of it are such as no one can deny or despise. Probably no one in this mission has so wide an influence as she among the Japanese, for not only the women regard her with the highest esteem and affection, but many men of influence receive her suggestions with respect. According to the latest quarterly report of the Bible Societies Committee, 86,255 copies of the Scriptures were sold in Japan in the last quarter of 1895.

Helping the Newsboys.

Harry McKnight, who is known in Philadelphia as "The Newsboys' Friend," and who is Vice-President of the National Association of Newsboys, of Washington, D. C., is preparing to organize a branch among the newsboys of New York. The object of the Association is to do missionary work among the street gamins. While looking after the spiritual welfare of the boys, the Association arranges for their support during sickness, and befriends them in many other ways. The Newsboys' Sunday School Mission in Philadelphia has been a pronounced success. The New York headquarters will be at the Florence Mission, on Bleeker Street, for the present.

Peace, be Still.

ENGLAND has not always acted kindly toward this nation; but what is the use of keeping the old grudge good while it is certain that England and the United States stand side by side to-day in the great cause of civilization and Christianity? When England is humiliated, the Church of God and the cause of Christ are humiliated. Look at her churches, her Bible and Missionary societies, her universities. Look at her throne, the purest in Europe, if not in all the world. The girl Victoria, kneeling with her ecclesiastic adviser in prayer, on the night before her coronation, made vows to God and promises to England, not one of which has she ever broken. Her sorrows have been the world's sorrows; her bereavements the world's bereavements. The fact is that the most we can do in this crisis of the world's history is to implore God to arise for the safety of his Church, for the deliverance of the captives, for the downfall of despotism, for the ransom of all nations. Let sin perish and Christ reign. Though the plowshare of battle cut through from St. George's Channel to China Sea, Christ shall have all the dominion, and all the power, and all the glory, world without end.

Home Life.

IT is hardly possible that a business man should be thrifless if he has a companion always ready to encourage and assist him—ready to make sacrifices until his affairs may allow him opportunity for luxuries. Hundreds of fortunes that have been ascribed to the industry of man bear upon them the mark of a wife's hand. Want of domestic economy has ruined many a fine business. I have known a delicate woman strong enough to carry off her husband's store on her back and not half try! I have known men running the gauntlet between angry creditors while the wife was declaring large and unprecedented dividends among millinery stores. I have known men, as the saying goes, with their nose to the grindstone and their wives most vigorously turning the crank. Solomon said a good wife is from the Lord, but took no thought for the day of wrath. If other kind comes from. I have seen men who, at the marriage altar, thought they had found a treasure more valuable than Cuba, who found out afterward that they got only an album and a medicine chest. Many a man, weary under misfortune, has been held up by a wife's arm, a wife's prayer, a wife's decision; while many a man in comfortable circumstances has his life pestered out of him by a shrew who meets him at night at the door, dragging out the children whom she had promised a flogging, as soon as the old man came home to the scene of domestic felicity. There are husbands of women who are the joy and adornment of our American homes, combining with elegant taste in the arts and accomplishments which our best seminaries and highest style of literature can bestow upon them, an industry and a practicality which always insure domestic happiness and prosperity. As Alexander the Great with pride showed the Persian princes garments made by his own mother, so they can show you the triumphs of their adroit womanly fingers. They are as graceful in the kitchen as in the parlor; if need be, they go there. They know, without asking the housekeeper, the difference between a washtub and a filter. They never sew on a coat a liquorice drop for a black button. They never mistake a bread-tray for a cradle. Boarding schools are necessities of society, but there are seminaries for young ladies which, instead of sending their students back to their homes with good sense as well as diplomas, dispatch them with manners and behavior far from civilized. With the promptness of a police officer they arraign their old-fashioned grandfather for murdering the king's English. Staggering down late for breakfast they excuse themselves in French phrase. The young men who were her best friends when she left the farm-house for the city school, come to greet her home again, with a broad English which does not properly sound the "R" or mince the "S." Coming home with heath gone, her father paid the tuition bill, but nature had handed in the following account:

MISS OBERLIN ANGELINA, to MRS. MARY VICTOR, DR.
To one year's neglect of exercise 15 chills
To one night's late retiring, 75 twitches of the nerves
To months of improper diet.... A lifetime dyspepsia Added up, making in all an exhausted system, chronic neuralgia, and a couple of fits.

Call in Dr. Pillsbury and uncork the camphor bottle; but it is too late, and what an adornment such an one will be to the house of some young merchant or lawyer or mechanic! Let the briefs come never so rapidly into the office, let the goods find never so ready a sale, let the sheaves come never so rapidly into the barn, that man will be a drudge while he lives and a drudge when he dies.

Share and Share Alike.

THE worst family feuds are created by inequalities of inheritance. It is often the case that one of the family coddles the old gentleman in his last days, makes mustard plasters for him, keeps his catnip tea hot, turns up his coat collar, runs the fingers through his gray locks, saying how fine they look, and tucks in the covers after he has gone to bed, with reference to the inheritance; so that the fondler of the old man gets paid for his services at the rate of about one hundred dollars per mustard plaster and fifty dollars per tuck. Partiality on your part is a sin against God as well as against your children, except in those cases where through physical or mental defect it is evident that a child will be less able to help himself. In that case, let there be more inheritance rather than less. If your children start life with two hands and two feet and a healthy brain, they have a grand fortune to start with. Look out for those who enter the battle of life already maimed. If there be any favoritism, let it be in that direction. It was to the everlasting honor of John Jacob Astor that his imbecile son has, through his father's provision, all his life been waited on like a prince. If you want all your children to revere your memory when you are dead, and pass down your name with honor to other generations, let them on that solemn day when, after the obsequies have passed, the family are called together to hear the will read—let them hear the single, unphasedology: "My children are to share and share alike, and the children of my deceased son to have in full what would have been their father's portion." The Surrogate's record of wills is often the story of appalling injustice. "George, what makes you work so hard and drudge away all your strength? I thought your father left a fine property." "Oh yes," you say; "he did, but Bill got it."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

J. R. C., Egremont Plain, Mass., writes:

I am pleased and more than pleased with the Bible premium. We have perhaps a dozen Bibles, but the print is too small for my eyes, as I am sixty-six years old, or they are so large they are inconvenient to handle. But this is just what I want. It is a pleasure to show it and the paper to neighbors.

J. H., Akron, O. Did Christ's injunction to Peter (Luke 22: 32), "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren," imply that he was not then converted?

The word rather implies restored than converted in the sense in which is now used. When Peter repented he was received not as a converted man but as a backslider sorry for his fall. The descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, to which you refer, was not to convert but to give special power for service.

Mrs. M. S., Plymouth, Mch. Do you turn over your funds for the Armenians to the Red Cross Society, when Clara Barton enters upon the work? I hold funds—now in trust—for that object and wait a little to know where best to send them.

There is no certainty that the Red Cross will be admitted in Armenia, Turkey, having refused permission. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund is cabled through the American Board weekly to Constantinople and thence sent to its missionaries in the interior. Ten relief stations have already been opened by the Fund. All moneys sent to us are applied directly in this way.

In a letter from San Andres, U. S. of Colombia, S. A., D.M.H., a reader, says:

I am reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD daily. I am sixty-four years old and have been a sailor since I was thirteen. Am a native of Holland and a citizen of the United States, and am now residing on the island of San Andres, doing what I can for the benefit of my fellow-creatures. We have in our church about three hundred members, many of them live members in Christ, though some are dead members. But I feel that the spirit is here and expect a revival soon.

L. A. Hart, Cowlesville, N. Y. I would very much like to have you tell us something of Miles Standish.

Captain Standish is mentioned frequently in the published accounts of the experiences of the Pilgrim fathers who came over on the Mayflower. He was Governor Bradford's bravest and most trusted military leader, and distinguished himself in the wars against the savages, who would have exterminated the little colony. Longfellow has immortalized in verse the story of the doughty Captain's courtship of "Priscilla, the Puritan Maiden," by proxy, John Alden being chosen for that delicate mission.

How is it that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can establish relief stations for the Armenians, when the Sultan has refused to tolerate the Red Cross?

Our relief stations have been established by co-operation with the American Board, at points where it has missionaries. These missionaries have been at their posts for years, and being known to the Turkish authorities and to the people, are not objected to as distributors of relief. The objection to the admission of the Red Cross would probably have been the same had any other outside organization proposed to enter the country. Newcomers are not desired by the Ottoman government.

D. A. B., Cressona, Pa., and others. Why did Paul forbid women speaking in church. (See 1 Cor. 14: 34-35.)

It was necessary at that time. In Corinth there was a tendency to conduct which was regarded as immodest. Women were in subjection and there was a great deal of immorality in the city. If in the newly organized Christian church women had come to the front and taken a prominent part in the proceedings it would have caused scandal and reproach, and would have done the church irreparable injury. There is no good reason for thinking that Paul intended his prohibition to apply to all lands and for all time.

Mrs. H. L. Magie. Was there a Pope during the first three centuries of the Christian Era, that is, before Constantine came to the throne?

In the Roman Annals, Annalia Catholica, the chronological record of the Popes begins with St. Peter, his term as Pontiff extending from A. D. 42 to 67. The claim, of course, is purely a formal one, made for the sake of tracing the Pontifical authority back to apostolic time, and it is not recognized by unbiased chroniclers. The history of the Church of Rome during the first century is obscure, but that church even today puts forward the claim of a long traditional line of Pontiffs from Peter to Sixtus III, (A. D. 440 A. D.) It is unquestioned that during the first three centuries there was a gradually increasing tendency to concede to the Roman Church, and later to the Bishop of Rome, an honorary supremacy and an extended jurisdiction, but the Ecumenical Council of Nice (325) made merely an incidental reference to the Bishop of Rome, while it conferred upon the Bishops of Antioch and Alexandria metropolitan rights in their provinces, "the same as belongs to the Bishop in Rome." The first Pope in the proper sense of the title was Leo I (440-461, A. D.)

W. W., Chicago, Ill. Is the payment of tithes obligatory in the Christian dispensation as it was under the Jewish?

The Christian is not under law. At the time the Gospel was first preached to the Gentiles the question was raised as to their being required to obey the law and there was a council of the Apostles in which it was discussed. The decision is given Acts 15: 28, 29. Certain things necessary in existing circumstances were enjoined and no other burden was laid on the new converts. There is consequently no Scriptural law of tithe. But it cannot be said that there is no obligation. The Christian would show a poor appreciation of his better privileges if he did not give to God as much as the Jew did. His offering is voluntary but his own conscience would tell him that a tenth is the minimum rate.

Wm. T. Summers, Louisville, Ky. Was the raising of the brazen serpent, Num. 21: 9, a violation of the command against making images, Ex. 20: 4, and was it not liable to lead to image-worship?

It was eventually worshipped. In II Kings 18: 4, there is the record of Hezekiah breaking it to pieces because the people persisted in burning incense to it. Moses, however, was not responsible for that result. The history Numbers states explicitly that he was acting in obedience to God's command in making the brazen serpent. The law in Exodus was directed against the making of images obviously because of this tendency. The reference Christ made to it in his talk with Nicodemus shows that the general understanding of it in that day was that it was a test of faith. The people were not intended to worship it, but to look at it, that is to apply a means of cure which would seem to them utterly inadequate. Their obedience would show whether they believed or not.

J. T. D., St. Clare, Kan. 1. Can people be baptized unto repentance now as they were in the time of John the Baptist? 2. Is there any authority for observing Sunday as the Sabbath?

1. A person who has repented of his sins and has accepted Christ as his Saviour can be baptized now and any Baptist minister will willingly perform the ceremony. If you mean to ask whether repentance can come by baptism we answer, no. Nor could it in John the Baptist's time. With him baptism was the outward expression of the inward change which had already taken place. The people were not baptized that they might repent, but because they had repented and the rite indicated the cleansing or washing away that had occurred. It was a declaration of an intention to forsake sin. 2. Sunday is not kept as the Sabbath but as the Lord's Day. The early Christians kept holy a seventh part of their time as the Jews did, but they observed Sunday instead of Saturday in celebration of Christ's resurrection. Orthodox Jews still observe Saturday but the Christian the work over shows his love and reverence for his Lord by honoring the day when he rose from the dead. He does not give it to rest as the Jew did his Sabbath, but to sacred activity in his Lord's service.

W. McV. It would be sharp practice of which a Christian should not be guilty—S.P.H., Chicago. 1. Too vague and indefinite for popular acceptance. 2. A Theosophist who made the declaration you write and who lived up to it would be a Christian not a Theosophist. 3. Same answer applies. Christianity crucifies self and spends itself on others. 1. Is sacrifice for others, and reaches out into all avenues of helpfulness which no other religion does. A. D., N. Y. The Ten Commandments are in Exodus 20.—A.S.B., Chicago, Ill. 1. Yes, still good. 2. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Relics of Ancient Egypt.

CABLE dispatches from Cairo report discoveries of extreme interest to Egyptologists. Mr. Jacques de Morgan, the Director General of Antiquities, has succeeded in clearing away several feet of the soil and sand in which the bases of the pillars of the great Temple at Karnak were imbedded. The floor of the Temple is still a few feet below the surface. The alluvial deposits brought by the Nile have been undisturbed for thirteen hundred years, and the work of clearing them away will occupy still a long time to come. On this age is a picture of one part of the Temple as it appears now that the lower part of the columns is laid bare. There are still standing 134 of these beautiful columns, rich in sculpture and bearing inscriptions of inestimable value to historians. It is necessary to proceed with the work with extreme caution, as in some instances the bases of the pillars have crumbled, and unless they are repaired they are liable to fall with the immense monolithic blocks which rest upon them. It is believed that Seti I., whose cartouche is the oldest yet found in the Temple, was not its builder, but that it dates back to Amenophis III., who reigned about fifteen hundred years before Christ. It was a magnificent pile, covering three acres. Besides the columns there were two hundred sphinxes, and long and stately flights of steps leading into the various courts of the Temple. The walls were covered with hieroglyphics and bas-relief sculptures of great beauty, delicately chiselled and vividly colored. One of these exquisite bas-reliefs is shown in the lower panel of our illustrations. It represents the heathen goddess Isis, whose ears, according to the myth, caused the overflow of the Nile. She is pictured holding on her knees her son, Horus, who in Egyptian mythology represents the sun and the three great planets. Two-thirds of the chief wall on which the bas-reliefs were cut was thrown down by an earthquake near the beginning of our era, and the work of devastation was carried further by the Persian army of Cambyses, but sufficient remains to indicate the subjects the bas-reliefs were designed to commemorate. They relate to the conquests of Seti I. in Western Asia and Sheshank I. in Palestine. We may therefore conclude, if as is now generally believed, Rameses II. was the Pharaoh of the Oppression, that this Temple must have been in its glory when Moses was being educated in Egypt, and that his eyes must have rested on the sculptures now laid bare. The present desolation is a striking fulfilment of the prophecy pronounced against Egypt in the days of its power:

I will make the land waste and all that is therein by the hand of strangers. . . . I will also destroy all the idols and I will cause their images to cease. Ezek. 30: 13.

Judicially Dead.

A suit to compel the revoking of a declaration of death has just been tried in New Jersey. It arose out of the partition of an estate. Under the terms of a will of a wealthy furniture-dealer, who died recently in Jersey City, it was necessary to have all the heirs appear in court before the property could be divided. One son of the deceased was absent and had not been heard from in eleven years. He left his wife and home in 1884, went West and had not written to her since. No one else had seen or heard from him and the general impression was that he was dead. Application was accordingly made to have him declared dead, under a law which gives the Court power to declare a man dead who has not been heard of for seven years. The declaration was made and a day was set for the partition of the estate. But on the day appointed, a telegram was presented from the missing man, who had heard in San Francisco of what had been done. The case was postponed to await his arrival. He duly appeared in Court a few days ago, with witnesses who identified him. It was necessary to bring a formal suit to have the court-record of his death revoked and this having now been done, the estate will be divided and the man will get his share. It is not so with the heavenly inheritance. He who will enjoy that is glad to be able to say:

I am dead to the law that I might live unto God. Gal. 2: 19.

A Hermit Politician.

The inauguration of the new Governor of New Jersey has incidentally led to a family reunion. A press dispatch from Blairstown, N. J., reports that after the inauguration a citizen of that place went to his home from which he had been absent nearly thirty years. In the fall of 1865 he took an active part in the campaign for Marcus L. Ward who was a candidate for the Governorship. He was a personal friend of Ward, and worked day and night to secure his election. He was deeply chagrined when his candidate was defeated. His wife belonged to the opposite party. She came of a family conspicuous in politics and always on the same side. During the canvass he had been vexed at the knowledge that her sympathies were not with him but with his foes. His sons and daughter also were opposed to him through their mother's influence. In his chagrin at the result of the election, he could not bear to live at home where there was general satisfaction over the issue at the polls. He bought some timber and went out into the woods and there built himself a hut. He furnished it and removed his personal belongings to it. His wife visited him and begged him to return but he would not. He declared he would never live at home again until he had seen a Governor of his own political party inaugurated. He kept his word. For nearly thirty years he has made the hut in the woods his home and has not slept under the same roof as his family. Last fall a Governor of his party was elected and he went to Trenton the other day to witness the inauguration ceremony. At its close, he did not return to his hut in the woods, but went to his home where he received a warm welcome. Probably when he was married he had no idea that the difference between his own political affiliations and those of his wife would ever involve so much pain and so long a separation. It doubtless seemed to him unimportant in those days. So a religious difference often appears to young people which, as in the case of John Wesley, results in lifelong irritation and distress. They are wise who follow the Apostolic advice:

Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers: for what communion hath light with darkness? (2. Cor. 6: 14.)

The Law of Foundations.

Few owners of property in New York were aware until last week of the existence of a law which affects their interests. The Superintendent of Buildings called attention to it in his testimony before the Supreme Court Commission which is making an inquiry in connection with the Rapid Transit scheme. He said that under the existing law, if any person having a foundation dug, found that his neighbor's wall did not go down ten feet below the line of the pavement, the neighbor would have to be at the risk and cost of whatever work was necessary to secure its safety. If the foundation was a clear ten feet down, then the responsibility and expense of underpinning, or shoring up, fell upon the person erecting the new building adjoining it; but if it fell short of that depth by only a few inches, he was not responsible for any injury that might come to the dwelling from his own excavation. This law may be put to a very heavy expense if, when his property was built, the foundations were not sunk as deep as the law required. He must, if occasion to excavate arises, not only make good the original defect, but go down as deep as may be required by the depth of his neighbor's excavation. The same principle is often seen working in our lives. Negligence or wrong doing in early life may be pleasant or profitable at the time, but the penalty exacted later far outweighs the advantage that was gained. Many have learned by experience how true was the warning of the wise king, to an offender who congratulated himself on escaping detection that ultimately

He shall restore seven fold: he shall give all the substance which he hath. Prov. 6: 31.

A Juvenile Feud.

The report of a serious injury to a boy appears in a New Jersey journal. In the northeastern district of Paterson, known as Weavertown, from the fact of silk weavers having first settled it, a large crowd of boys fell to fighting. Some of them came from another part of the city to which the name of Hogtown is derisively given. These had gone to Weavertown for the purpose of fighting, and finding themselves outnumbered by the Weavertown boys, they sent to their own section for reinforcements. A contingent promptly responded, and one of the boys brought an air-gun. The fight was renewed on their arrival, and was carried on vigorously for over an hour. Sticks and stones were used, and there were several hand-to-hand fights with bare knuckles. Meanwhile the boy with the gun was carrying on a bombardment. Suddenly the cry was raised that some one was shot. A boy who was on the outskirts of the crowd watching the fight, but taking no part in it, was struck in the eye by a bullet. The invading contingent seeing him fall, and fearing he was killed, ran off the field to their own section of the city, and the Weavertown boys carried the wounded boy to a physician to have his injuries attended to. He was not dangerously hurt but will probably lose the sight of his eye. It appears that the feud of which this fight was an episode, has continued for fifteen years, the rival factions being recruited by new boys as the combatants dropped out on growing to manhood. The strange feature of the trouble is that no one knows in what the feud originated. It is much to be wished that the boys had more sense than to perpetuate a feud the very origin of which is forgotten, but such folly is not peculiar to boys. It is often necessary to remind grown men and even Christians of different denominations that

The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men. 1. Timothy 2: 14.

BRIEF NOTES.

At the Bowery Mission on Sunday, Jan. 26, there was a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit. There were a large number of persons seeking salvation. No less than one hundred and twenty-four made profession of faith.

The Sympathy of the Whole Christian Community will be with Mr. D. L. Moody in the recent bereavement he has sustained in the death of his aged mother. Mrs. Betsey Moody, who was greatly beloved and familiarly known to everyone in Northfield, Mass., as "Grandma" Moody, passed away peacefully on Sunday, January 26. She had no sickness and was conscious to the last, death coming as the result of extreme old age. Mrs. Moody was born in 1825.

The Prohibitionists of Toronto have won a victory at the polls. Of the twelve candidates for municipal office they supported, eight were elected.

Mr. Moody has commenced a Series of meetings in Philadelphia. The total attendance at the opening services in Grace Baptist Temple at the morning and evening services was 10,000.

Mr. Francis E. Leupp, the New Indian Commissioner nominated by President Cleveland, was formerly agent of the Indian Rights Association of Washington, and is a sincere and energetic friend of the Indians.

The Hospital Book and Newspaper Society of New York will be glad to receive parcels of books or periodicals for distribution in the hospitals and prisons if sent prepaid to the offices of the society, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York.

The Methodist Episcopal Church South has lost an eminent and much venerated leader in Bishop Atticus G. Haygood, who died at his home in Oxford, Ga., on Jan. 19. The Bishop was in his fifty-seventh year, and had been a Bishop twenty-three years.

According to Figures Issued by Dr. C. C. McCabe, the Methodist Church has gained since 1883 no less than 6,388 churches. The total number is now 25,120. The number of sittings provided by those additional churches is 1,800,000. The total membership is now 2,715,145.

General Booth, when in South Africa, had a long interview with the President of the Transvaal Republic, and was much impressed by his simplicity of mind, and rejoiced to know that he frequently preached at Johannesburg.

Statistics compiled by the Editor of the Missionary Herald, show that the number of stations in heathen lands occupied by Protestant missionaries now reaches 5,055 with 17,813 out-stations. Of these 993 stations and 4,912 out-stations are occupied by American missionaries. There are 37 missionary societies in this country, which have sent out in all 3,512 missionaries, of whom 2,043 were women.

A Remarkable Religious Awakening has occurred at Niagara Falls, N. Y., under the preaching of Evangelist W. E. Geil, of Doylestown, Pa. Rev. Albert S. Bacon, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, informs us that over six hundred cards were signed by persons seeking salvation. It is estimated that the audiences in the Old Armory were over 1500 every night of the evangelist's stay.

The American Congregational Church Building Society at its recent annual meeting reported receipts for the year of $106,000, a sum larger than that of the previous year. One hundred and thirty-nine churches have been erected during the year, an increase of twenty-two, and forty-two parsonages. Henry A. Stimson, D.D., Pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church, in this city, was elected President to succeed the late Dr. William M. Taylor.

The Evangelistic Meetings held on Monday afternoons in Cooper Union, New York, have been crowded each week. On Monday, Jan. 26, it was proposed that a daily meeting should be held, and the funds to meet the necessary expenses were at once subscribed. This week, therefore, there is a meeting every day, at three o'clock, in the large hall of the Institute, preceded by a short outdoor service in Astor Place, at the base of the Cox statue.

An Interesting Young People's Convention is being held in Los Angeles, Cal., from Feb. 1 to March 1. It will be composed of the Christian Endeavor Societies, Epworth Leagues and Baptist Young People's Societies of California which have contributed their forces to make the Convention mutually helpful. Several eminent speakers from the East have promised to attend and take part in the proceedings. Such a combination is a very hopeful sign, and we hope the Convention will prove a complete success.

Ashanti's Fallen Kingdom

Once Notorious for its Heathen Sacrifices, now Subjugated by British Invasion—King Prempeh's Court.

ASHANTI, one of the native kingdoms of West Africa, lying contiguous to the Abanta and Fanti countries, which border on the Gold Coast, has once more been the scene of armed invasion by a European power. The Ashantis were originally a great and powerful people, whose territory reached to the sea-board. In 1826 they were driven inland, and afterward, King Koffee Kalcalli invaded several parts of the British Protectorate, made an attack upon Fantiland, in which Cape Coast Castle is situated, and held several Europeans prisoners. This was the occasion of a second Ashanti war, in 1873-4, which was conducted by Sir Garnet Wolseley. The warriors of Koffee were defeated, Coomassie, the Ashanti capital, was burned, and the captives were released. The well-known traveler, Mr. H. M. Stanley, then a war correspondent, accompanied the British expedition, and thus described the capital:

Coomassie was a town insulated by a deadly swamp. A thick jungle forest—so dense that the sun seldom pierced the foliage, so sickly that the strongest fell victims to the malaria it cherished—surrounded it to a depth of one hundred and forty miles seaward, many hundred miles east, as many more west, and one hundred miles north. Through this forest and swamp, unrelieved by any novelty or a single pretty landscape, the British army had to march one hundred and forty miles, leaving numbers behind sick of fever and dysentery. Five days' hard fighting ended the march, and Coomassie was at the mercy of the conquerors to sack and burn to the ground. When this work was done, the commander of the force was compelled to march his soldiers back again to the sea, to save the remnant from perishing by flood and disease."

Coomassie was soon built again, and the present king, Prempeh, a mere youth, was called to the throne. He has followed the policy of his predecessor, toward Europeans generally and the British in particular, and this with other reasons, afforded the provocation for the recent expedition which has resulted in the fall of his capital and the capture of the king in person, by an English force under Sir Francis Scott.

Our illustrations are from photographs specially procured for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One presents a view of the principal street or thoroughfare of Ashanti, with some of the natives grouped on either side. Near the lower end of the street is a tree which branches rested as prisoners a missionary, Mr. Ramseyer, his wife, and their emaciated child, while awaiting the decision of the King of Coomassie as to their fate. This was in 1890. Another photograph shows a missionary telling the story of the Gospel of Jesus to a chief, who sits under a State canopy in the market place surrounded by his people. All matters of public interest are discussed in this place. In such a case, a missionary may find himself face to face with the chief man of a tribe, or possibly of a nation, and if he can seize the opportunity and ask them to cease their debate for a moment, he will then proceed to lay before them from the Evangelists the story of the Gospel of Jesus. His position at such a time may be one of peril, and it requires tact as well as eloquence to command their respect and hold their attention.

The recent invading expedition advanced overland to the capital, which lies beyond the river Prah at the rear of the British Gold Coast Colony a distance of less than 150 unless, but which was estimated to occupy fifteen to twenty days' laborious marching through a most unhealthy country. There was little difficulty in overcoming the resistance offered by King Prempeh's forces. What disposition will be made of the monarch and his territory is yet undecided.

Ashanti in former years was one of the most savage and barbarous of Africa's many petty principalities. Coomassie stands on the side of a rocky hill, surrounded by malarious swamps, which in the rainy season especially are hotbeds of fever. It had a population of about 30,000, though the natives say that it contains about 100,000 people. Just outside is the famous burial place of the Ashanti Kings—a very curious barbaric form of Westminster Abbey. Their religion is a system of fetish worship which entails great cruelties on the people, and ministers to the love of needless bloodshed which is so strong a characteristic of the race. One of the objects of the present expedition was to put a stop to human sacrifices, a custom which has been practised by the Ashantis for generations. A description of the pit into which the dead bodies are thrown was given by a Mr. Brackenbury, who took part in a former expedition. He says: "We saw a large open space, an acre or more in size—a dried-up pond it might be, for there are signs as of a hollow, now filled up with human skulls and skeletons, on the top of which lie bodies, bloated, swollen, discolored, loathsome. Never a day passes but that foul grave demands fresh victims; never a night that the king does not offer fresh human sacrifices."

The Missionaries in Turkey.

They Had No Thought of Deserting Their Posts in Time of Danger.

REV. W. A. FARNSWORTH, an American missionary at Cesarea, but now on a visit to the United States, writing on the frightful massacres in Asiatic Turkey, asks the question: "Ought the missionaries in the most seriously disturbed parts of Turkey to leave their stations? Three years ago the writer felt that he was living over a powder magazine. The explosions, though long delayed, have at length come, and they have proved to be far worse than our fears. The future is ominous. Ought the missionaries to seek for places of greater safety?"

"My daughter with five of my grandchildren has, for weeks, been living in constant fear of an attack from a murderous horde of freebooters. Ought she with those dear children to seek safety by going where she and they can be protected by the Stars and Stripes? I am glad that she does not ask me that question. She asks it only of the Master who has placed her assembled two American ladies have boarding-school for girls, with some sixty pupils. One of these ladies has been working for more than a quarter of a century building up that school. Had these ladies left Talas when they saw the cyclone of destruction about to sweep down, would it not have struck Talas? What would have been the fate of the school?"

these women? What that of these school girls? What the future of that school?"

"We dare not say that these women are not acting in the wisest way by remaining at their posts and grappling bravely with the peculiar duties that the times lay upon them. This is their supreme opportunity. To have lost it would have been a calamity. The same is true of that brave M.

Brewer, of Sivas, who nobly wrested an Armenian woman from the hands of her associates at Hadji So of Mrs. Montgomery, Miss Webb at Adana, with one brave woman away off in Mesopotamia. These are the great opportunities of their lives; nobly are they meeting them. If, all things considered, it is wiser to these single ladies and even the mothers with their children remain at their posts, surely there can be no doubt as to the men. Take the case of Mr. Wingate, one of the younger and less experienced of the missionaries. Only he and Mr. Burrage were in the city of Cesarea on the fearful night of November, all others being in Talas, where we have our Girls' Boarding-School.

"A letter speaking of the massacre says: 'Mr. Wingate found great difficulty in keeping soldiers to defend his house. He got a lost them, time and again. They would slip away. At last he got hold of an ashshi (a commander of troops) with his company, invited them in, gave them a comfortable place of the chilly air, and simply coddled them into staying by to the last.' In another place the same letter says: 'The people in the region around Mr. Wingate's are ready to kiss his feet' (the way in the Orient of expressing the deepest gratitude). He saved many and did his duty nobly. His experience has won for him golden opinions from many. He went, with a yak (policeman), to a Turkish house and demanded the bride and the daughter who had been carried off from a house near him and got them both.' What a cause for gratitude that Mr. Wingate was there and that he met the demands of the occasion so well! Providence favoring, it greatly increase his influence for good. He and all of us may well rejoice that he was there at that critical time. The missionaries in Turkey are making history. If they are able to remain in the land, there is a noble future before them. If the Armenians in the empire, some 900,000 and one-half millions, are ready as never before to accept the Gospel message,

A MISSIONARY PREACHING TO THE COURT OF AN ASHANTI KING.

How many more victims may have been thrown into that pit of sacrifice during the twenty years since that description was penned!

Although Missionaries Ramseyer and Kuhne of the Basle Mission labored for sometime in Ashanti, no regular missions have been established in that country. The people are wholly under the power of fetishism, and the priests and sorcerers rule with despotic sway. While war is an evil, the present expedition may have one good result: it may draw the attention of missionaries to a barbarous people and may send them the glorious Gospel.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its missionaries, and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the glorification of God's name.

there. No doubt he will enable her to answer it aright. Neither she nor any other one in all these smitten regions has, so far as I know, seriously doubted what the duty of the hour is.

"Has there ever been a time when the missionaries in Turkey could do so much for the good of the people for whom they are there as they can at just this time? Not to mention the great relief work that they are doing at Trebizond, at Van, at Harpoot, and at every station indeed where the massacres have occurred, their very presence is both a comfort and a protection to very many afflicted, frightened, sorrowing people. Take the case of Talas, a suburb of Cesarea. No massacre has occurred there, but the fear is so great that some sixty women have fled to the mission premises, and there they are engaged in making garments for those who, in neighboring villages, have been left by marauders almost if not entirely naked. In the same place where these women are

Church Loyalty.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor topic for the Week Beginning Feb. 16
Salm 84.

WHILE each denomination has a record which will appropriately form the subject of the consideration of its members this week, there are features common to all which should not be overlooked. There is a tendency, against which Christians need to be on their guard, to dwell on the imperfections of some denominations as if they enhanced the excellences of others. The fact of a denomination supporting a hundred or more missionaries in heathen lands is a thing to rejoice in, but there are some people who do not feel that all the good of it is realized, unless they can point to some other denomination, which is supporting only twenty or thirty. Nothing is gained by disparaging the brethren. An achievement, whatever it may be, stands on its own merits and is of the same value whether it is done by one denomination or by twenty. The Church universal is interested in the question whether some work is done more thoroughly by one denomination than by another, and so the consideration of the value of effort in its relative respect is not excluded, but for the workers to disparage each other, to be glad that the aggressive work of other denominations is crippled by debt or by other burden is not Christian. The feelings of Christians of one denomination toward Christians of another, should be that of allies on the battlefield, not of enemies or rivals. The Christian Endeavor Society, among its many achievements, has accomplished none more beneficial to the church at large than that of impressing this fact of brotherly comradeship on its members, and helping them to realize the essential unity of Christians under every name.

In the Psalm on which the topic is based, is an expression that indicates the principle of such wide toleration. The writer has been speaking of the blessings of being present in the sanctuary and he adds a blessing for "the man in whose heart are the ways of them," as the Revised Version has it, "the man whose heart are the high ways to Zion." Though he may not be able to go to the sanctuary, or may be in a sanctuary where he people do not worship according to his creed, still he is blessed if in his heart is the way of communication with God. Such a man is not dependent on his surroundings for the religious spirit. To him every place becomes a Bethel. There are places and associations in which he is peculiarly happy, but in any place he can meet God, if he has the way in his heart. With men of this kind the Christian, whatever his creed may be, has a hearty sympathy. They are upon common ground, desiring the triumph of good, longing for personal holiness, rejoicing in the love and favor of God. The struggle is one, the enemy united, the danger identical. Each seeking victory by the means that best help his peculiar nature. If one finds in the grave and solemn liturgy of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a help to progress, and another finds help in the Methodist Church, or the Salvation Army, there is reason for common thankfulness. Each is reaching upward and climbing by the way he finds suitable to his own spirit. "There are many ways to the top of the mountain Fujiama," says a Japanese proverb, "but each leads to the summit and all who arrive there see the same sun." So let us rejoice with our brother of another name, if in his spiritual climbing he has found the path that suits him, and let us hail our fellow traveler and wish him Godspeed though we take a different road.

You or I.

If we could know
Which of us would be first to go,
Who would be first to breast the swelling tide,
And step alone upon the other side —
If we could know!

If it were you,
Should I walk softly, keeping death in view?
Should I to you my love more oft express?
Or should I grieve you, dear one, any less
If it were you?

If it were I,
Should I improve the moments slipping by?
Should I more closely following God's plan
Be filled with a sweeter charity to man —
If it were I?

I would not know
Which of us two will be the first to go.
I only wish the space may not be long
Between the parting and the greeting song;
But when, or where, or how we're recalled to go —
I would not know.

As-So.

ROUND Jerusalem beloved,
The encircling mountains stand.
Like a guard o'er Holy City,
In the Holy chosen Land,
So the Lord about his people,
Watchful stands through night and day,
Evermore their steps he guardeth
Through the changing earthly way.
As the Father well hath loved me,
So have I still loved my own,
I have chosen, I will keep you,
That in him we may be one.
As the bridegroom glad rejoices
O'er his lovely chosen bride,

So thy God o'er thee rejoices,
Keeps thee ever by his side.
As the little child in sorrow
Seeks at once the dear home-nest,
In the tender mother presence.
Finding comfort sweet and rest.
Even so will I give comfort.
Speak the healing word of peace,
And you shall no more have sadness
All the lonely heart-ache cease.

And as Christ our Lord and Saviour, Freely hath our sins forgiven,
So may we forgive each other,
In the spirit of his heaven.
As from the beloved Master,
We have precious grace received,
So may we walk in his footsteps,
Honor him we have believed.

THEO. A. HOLDER.

Mark the Soft-Falling Snow.

MARK the soft-falling snow,
And the diffusive rain;
To heaven from whence it fell,
It turns not back again,
But waters earth through every pore,
And calls for all its secret store.

"So," saith the God of grace,
"My Gospel shall descend —
Almighty to effect
The purpose I intend:
Millions of souls shall feel its power,
And bear it down to millions more.

"Joy shall begin your march,
And peace protect your ways,
While all the mountains round
Echo melodious praise;
The vocal groves shall sing the God,
And every tree consenting nod."

Christ's Second Coming.

Scripture Evidences that the Passages Relating to the Second Advent do not Refer to the Death of the Believer.

BY W. E. B.*

CHRIST'S first coming did not mean death to the Jews, and they did not so understand it; neither does his second coming mean death to Christians, nor should they so understand it.

Jesus makes a clear distinction between death and his coming in John 21: 21-23.

He tells Peter how he should die, and then, by contrast, he speaks of John, saying: "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" That is, that John might not die, but live till Jesus should come again. The disciples so understood it, and reported that he should not die.

Death is an enemy (1. Cor. 15: 26), and at Christ's coming we are raised from the dead, and shout victory over death and the grave. "O, Death, where is thy sting? O, Hades, where is thy victory?" 1. Cor. 15: 23, 54, 55.

If we are faithful unto death (that is, though faithfulness cost us our lives), he has promised us a crown (Rev. 2: 10), but we do not receive it until he comes. II. Tim. 4: 8; 1. Pet. 5: 4.

Nothing is promised us at death except to be at rest (II. Thess. 1: 7; Rev. 14: 13), in Paradise (Lu. 16: 22; 23: 43). But we are promised all things in the resurrection, when Jesus comes. Lu. 14: 14; 20: 35; 36; Rom. 8: 32. Therefore we find Paul yearning for this resurrection. Phil. 3: 11.

Let any one insert "death" in the passages which speak of Christ's coming, and see how it will apply. For instance: "For our conversation is in heaven, from whence, also, we look for death." Phil. 3: 20. If the reader thinks that this is an exceptional passage, we beg of him to try it in other Scripture, referring to his coming. The only possible similarity consists in analogy—viz: in the fact that we do not know the time when we shall die. But thanks be to God, we may not die at all, for "We shall not all sleep." 1. Cor. 15: 51.

"There will be one generation at least, who will realize that the coming of our Lord is not death."

It is assuming too much, to say that death is practically, to the believer, the coming of the Lord. For we do not know it, and the Scriptures do not assert it. On the contrary, the events which occur, as the Scriptures teach us, when the Lord comes, do not occur at the death of a Christian. The dead are not then raised, nor are the living believers changed, as they will be when the Lord comes. We know very little about Hades or the intermediate state of the dead, but it would appear from Rev. 6: 9-11, that the departed souls yearn for the execution of Judgment, which occurs when the Lord comes. See 1. Cor. 4: 5; II. Tim. 4: 11; Rev. 11: 18; Matt. 25: 31-40. Spiritually, the believer is with Christ now, and always (John 14: 23; Matt. 28: 20), but, to be with Christ, bodily or personally (John 12: 26; 17: 24), is only to be attained by the resurrection, at his coming. John 14: 3; I. Thes. 4: 18. Therefore, it is entirely unscriptural to instruct the believer to look for death, as being synonymous with, or equivalent to, the Lord's coming. The two events are in contrast, not in resemblance. Death means separation, silence, grief; Christ's coming means reunion, joyful acclaim, a new and glorious body, and the presence of Christ in power.

Home Life in the Transvaal.

Pres. Kruger's House and its Simple Surroundings—Social Life among the Boers.

"OM PAUL," as President Kruger is familiarly known among his people in the Transvaal, is at the present time a prominent figure in connection with the recent troubles in that part of Africa. A writer in the London Illustrated News, gives a very interesting description of President Kruger and his home in Pretoria, the seat of the Boer Government. He pictures him as being rough in manner even to the verge of bearishness, uncouth in the eyes of strangers and invariably dressed in a suit of broad-cloth, very much the worse for wear. Indoors and out, he wears a silk hat of rather antique pattern, and his attire generally is simple to the point of shabbiness. He has, however, the reputation of being a very courteous man, yet with no pretence to the pomp or style that might be expected of a high official and the head of an important Government. He has a rather poor opinion of England and the English and is not slow in expressing his views in this regard. Yet, with a keen eye to business, he has lost no opportunity to make Englishmen understand that they were welcome in the Transvaal, for he is sensible of the fact that British enterprise and capital have been important factors in building up the Boer State to its present important position in South African commerce. While he has made the Uitlanders feel that they were welcome accessions to the trade and population of the country, he has also impressed upon them the fact that Boer sovereignty was inviolable and that Boer laws were made to be respected and obeyed.

Essentially a farmer, the Boer's interests are, for the most part, confined to his flocks, his cattle, and his crops. He leaves to the Uitlanders the development of the rich gold fields. He is of a serious turn of mind, and intensely earnest in all matters of religion. The Boer father rules like a patriarch. He does not believe in the breaking up of families even when marriages take place and it is not an uncommon thing in the Transvaal to find in Boer dwellings, two and even three generations of kindred, sitting under the same roof and laboring on the same farm.

Oom Paul and his estimable wife Vrouw Kruger, live in a cosy, unpretentious cottage in Pretoria, which is shown in our illustration. Both are great Bible readers; indeed, even when the President is receiving a deputation or performing any public business, he is seldom without a Bible at hand. Mrs. Kruger takes no personal interest in politics—purely domestic affairs are quite enough for her. She has all the simplicity of a Boer housewife, and prefers to be overwhelmed with the responsibilities of a government even if it gives her a house rent free. She is of a saving disposition, and it is her proud task to see that as little as possible of the $2,000 a year "coffee money" which the government expends. Although her man has a very liberal State allowance, she believes that the Vrouw's dresses should be home-made, and in many other ways acts like a careful and economical housewife. The exactions of society in Pretoria are very small. All the life of Pretoria centres in the home and in her own plain, genuine life. Vrouw Kruger conducts the household, in its public and private relations, in accordance with long-established usage and tradition. She is greatly esteemed throughout the Transvaal, and is regarded by the Boers generally as a pattern housewife and a model of all the domestic and social virtues.

Reading Aloud.

One of the pleasantest ways of spending an evening, is that of listening to an interesting book read aloud and read well. Twenty-five or thirty years ago it was rather more common than it is at present for families to spend an evening in that way. Such a practice has several great advantages. In many households there are elderly people, the grandmother or grandfather, whose eyes do not permit them to read much by artificial light. It is a choice satisfaction for them to sit in an easy chair in a cosy corner surrounded by those they love, while some well-modulated voice interprets some charming story. Children also are readily imbued with a love of reading and good literature, and their general culture is unconsciously advanced. More, even than this, the household comes to have a common stock of associations and of information which adds indefinitely to the pleasurable of the intercourse. A family that have listened to the reading of the best books have a common fund upon which they draw for conversation, and the deeper unity of their household life is unconsciously and delightfully promoted.

Neighborly Courtesy.

Courtesy between neighbors in sometimes a matter of extreme delicacy. Perhaps there is no greater strain upon "neighborly feeling" than living next door to a poultry-yard whose inmates are allowed to "run"—making exercise-ground of the adjacent flower and vegetable gardens. A young lady who was subjected to this annoyance politely asked her neighbor to keep his pets at home. She asked it several times, and still no attention was paid to her grievance. Finally she hit upon an ingenious method of protecting herself. She prepared grains of corn by tying to them with strong carpet thread, small cards bearing the words, please keep your chickens at home! and distributed the grain about the flower-beds. The chickens came to feast as usual, and greedily swallowed the corn, not perceiving the thread until the card was against their jaws. Then they could neither swallow the card nor rid themselves of the swallowed corn. Twenty or thirty of the marauders ran home, bearing the polite request to their culpable owner, who, struck with the hint, promptly cut the threads and cooped up the birds. This was forcible, but a delicate hint, and doubtless had the desired effect.

Industrious Armenian Women.

A young lady residing in Vienna, who has passed several years in Armenia, in a recent letter gives an interesting picture of the women of that much-persecuted country. She says: "The products of industry which have made the country famous—silks and wools, carpets and embroideries—are all made by women, from the treatment of the raw material and the designs to the final processes of manufacture. No man claims to have any part in this work, nor does he dream of looking down upon woman as an inferior being. There is not a single proverb in all the dialects of the country that ridicules women, though there are innumerable ones in her praise. Armenians say: 'Let women learn all they can—they will be so much more useful, and we will marry them all the more willingly.'" There is a terrible dearth of doctors and lately there has been a movement among Armenian women looking to the study of medicine as a profession for their sex.

Making Others Happy.

THERE was a young lady once who was very unhappy. She lived in a fine house, and had lots of toys, a pony, and a watch; but she was very unhappy. Nothing could please her. Even the weather was never just what she wanted; it was sure to rain when she wanted it to be fine, or it was sure to be when she took out her nice new umbrella. From morning till night she murmured, grumbled, grumbled, and was very unhappy.

One day she came upon two poor children playing in a field, and they were having such a hearty game! You could hear their shouts of laughter almost at the village. "These children," said the little lady, "are very happy; their eyes are bright, and they seem so fond of one another, I think I shall ask them what makes them so happy." So she summoned courage and went to the biggest boy—was about seven—and said, "You are very happy; what makes you so?" The boy was a little shy at first before this fine lady, with her very fine dress, and little brother came and half hid behind her.

"What makes you so happy?" asked the little lady.

"I don't know, miss, what you mean," said the boy; "what's happy?"

"Why," she replied, "it means being glad, fond of things."

"Oh!" said the boy, "Jim and I are always glad; ain't we, Jim?" And the little brother danced like sunbeams upon ripples as he said, "Yes, always glad."

"But what makes you so glad?" asked the boy, "except that when I try to make Jim glad I get glad myself."

And that was all that he knew about the matter. But as the little lady went home she thought about it, and said to herself, "What the little boy means is that the way to be happy is by trying to make other people happy." So she thought she would try, and all that day instead of grumbling and murmuring and finding fault, she said, "Thank you!" with a pleasant smile; and "Don't you trouble me to do it!" in a nice spirit; and "What this task is a little difficult, but I will manage it!" And she found that everybody got pleasanter and pleasanter to her, and instead of always scolding her as before, or frowning on her, or sulking with her, everybody had a kind word for her, and people who used not to like her came to love her. So she learnt that the secret of happiness was within herself.

CHAPTER III.

My Captain and his Gold.

JANET MORTON'S home was not a pretentious residence. It was only a story and a-half house. It stood back from the street far enough to permit a hundred feet of lawn to spread out its surface of vivid green. Somehow, it had an air saying, "I don't wish everybody to have this with me and I stretch this lawn between myself and the public." Janet's big house jutted upon the sidewalk and almost overhung it as if daring the fact that he wished to project himself into the affairs of everybody. Told to the impression made by the white home that it was not a common one, though an unpretentious one, it was kept in excellent repair by Janet's hand. Its coat of paint was frequently renewed. All fences and outbuildings were promptly furnished with such ornamental coats. The trees were forbidden to strangle in their growth save two big ones before the house. These grew as they pleased and threw out and hung down from the roof huge leafy arms as if in jealous protection of the house. One of the peculiarities of the house was its solitary chimney. Its language was "One, a chimney." Its ample proportions above the roof suggested what it stood for a cold mortal beneath the eaves. One of its attendant blessings was that of fireplaces, open and shut. "I will make up a bed for John in the bedroom," concluded Janet. "I see he is weak that he will be my guest for a few days, and the sitting-room is the warmest in the house." The windows were gardens, for they were filled with plants, and here the sunshine was tempered with the sprays of blossoms. In his room had a generous fireplace, and the hospitable open fires were not only a cheery sight, but the draft was a sweeping any impure air up into the chimney. There was an attractive armchair, saying, "Do sit down!" "Come back and help ye," Jed had whispered to Janet. "Just want to shed my wet clothes and get on some dry ones and I'll come and make John comfortable." It was Jed who made a place in the sitting-room furniture for an old-fashioned bed from up-stairs, bringing the heavy mattress and then "setting it up." It was who stowed away in the kitchen a large quantity of firewood. Having paid his wages of a "Thank you," he was away contented with what he had earned, promising to "look in" some time in the morning. Mr. Blakey Chase was not long in arriving. "Yes!" she said, her bright but kindly eyes looking all about her. "What have you got now? Now I know, I know! You don't waste breath in telling me. I know all about it." "Hare say," said Janet smiling. "Any where goes on wheels." "Wheels, Janet! I tell 'em it wriggles as quick, like an eel." Sometimes, like a snake, she might have been. How did John bring home six months' gold? They say he did in a bag. He told somebody he had got more than that. Janet's smile became a laugh. "Did he lose it, Janet?" "I haven't seen it, Mrs. Chase, but it is far stranger happen." "Well, he brought home suthin'?" "The clothes on his back." "No tell! And nothin' more?" "I have seen nothing." "Well, Janet, anything I can do, you are welcome to. Can I help to-night?" "Nothing, thank you, to-night." She took little Ethel and went off with her, but came back ere long. Often did she return in after days to prove her efficiency, for she was a very well meaning, helpful soul. "Janet," said her guest the next morning, "if you don't care, I won't get up just yet. I—tried, but found my legs were not so willing as I was—" "Cousin, you keep quiet—" "I'm sorry to trouble—" "Oh! I am so glad to be troubled, and when Jed Davis comes—whom you remember—" "Yes, I don't know as I ever would have got ashore if it hadn't been for Jed and Sandy. I said that that to him last night." "Well, Jed will help me if I need help, and there is Mrs. Blakey Chase. Oh, many helpers I shall have!" She pulled out from a closet a little sick-tail that could be placed on the bed before a patient, and which had a top big enough to hold a few dishes. "Now, cousin," she said, as she set this table before him, "I have tea and toast for your breakfast and—" "That is all, please. Seems as if I had gone back to hospital. You see, Janet, I am just out of it. I have been there three months, you see. I got pretty badly wounded, but I am quite well now, and they thought they would give me a furlough, and—" "I hope they promoted you." "They gave me a captaincy," John said modestly. "My Captain, then. That is what I shall call you. I understand that My Captain wishes only for tea and toast." John nodded and smiled. When his breakfast arrived, he had drawn himself up in bed and was leaning against the head-board, looking rather pale after the effort. "How good-looking My Captain is!" thought Janet. John Morton was one that people always called, "handsome fellow." The gray was here and there streaking his dark, luxuriant hair, but the gray did not interfere with the beauty of the rich brown. His features were classically shaped, and the only criticism on his complexion was that it needed a touch of coloring which only good health could give. The frank, generous expression of the countenance was its best feature, and did not belie his character, for he was very open and unselfish in his disposition. That openness to everybody had been his ruin, for he had admitted bad influences to his company, and jolly but reckless associates had betrayed him into hurtful habits too strong for him. A beautiful woman tried to save him by marrying him, but her love was not so powerful as his appetite for drink. A married life of two years ended in her sickness and death, a little babe surviving her. Finally, John went into the army when the war broke out. It had been for John the most successful step he ever took. He was very popular in camp, without fear in battle, and any harm to his habits from the temptations of drink was less than in private life, for in camp there was a measure of restraint. Janet wondered if he had been drinking recently. "He does not show it," she said. No, the only thing he showed was the breeding of a gentleman, quiet, thoughtful, refined, and intelligent. Janet remembered the first few days of his stay at her house with peculiar interest and pleasure. There was a measure of uncertainty about the issue of his sickness which was not agreeable, the doctor's face assuming a look of much professional gravity, and in a whisper, he said, "Danger of a run of fever!" John, though, was only comfortably sick. He wished to talk, and Janet was a very agreeable companion. He liked to see her sweet, sedate face in the room, to hear her agreeable, rich voice, while her touch was always gentle and restful, and her care thoughtful and helpful.

"I am making you a lot of trouble," he said regretfully. "You need rest so much after your mother's sickness."

"And I need occupation still more. I am glad to have something to do. Occupation is diversion. It keeps me from thinking that might be unhealthy."

"Then you class occupation as medicine, cousin."

"Yes for our sick moods, and it is refreshment, and it is—Oh, a variety of good things it does! So don't say anything more about trouble."

"You are very kind to put it that way. I intended of course to get to mother's—"

"And you have got there. I am that venerable being for the present. And your mother while wishing to see you could not take care of you as I do."

"Has Paulina been here?"

"She came to-day in great excitement, having heard of your arrival by that breeches-buoy, but you were asleep and I could not disturb you. She left your mother's love and your mother will be glad to see you when you are able to go to her."

"I thought she would let me come home. Hark, whose voice is that?"

"Out in the kitchen. Oh, that is Mrs. Blakey Chase. You remember Blakey, good and slow?"

"All-day Blakey as I call him?"

"That is the one, or his wife rather," said Janet, leaving the room. It was Mrs. Blakey holding out in her prompt, nervous way, a little basket of eggs.

"Fresh ones, dear, that I thought would be good for Captain Morton. Everybody is so sorry for him. And, Janet, did you find out about the bag of gold he had with him? Folks say he had one, and did he lose it?"

"You spoke about it once before—thank you for the eggs—and I will ask the captain about the gold. Of course, if he lost it, and it is anywhere on land, it ought to be hunted up."

"That's what I say," declared Blakey's spouse energetically. "That's what I say. Will you ax him?"

She left her fresh eggs and her question and nervously ambled off. Janet said, "My Captain is comfortable this morning and I will ask him about that bag of gold."

He smiled when the question was asked, then shook his head. "I see what it came from. There is no bag of gold, but something better. One of the people on the beach when I was brought ashore, came to me and said, 'You bring anything with you from the vessel?' I smiled and said, 'Not much chance to fetch a cargo with me, a bag of gold, say.' I can see his eyes snapping now. He said, 'I s'pose you officers get paid off in gold.' That made me smile, for gold is a very precious and very scarce article as you well know. I said to him: 'Greenbacks are good enough,' meaning only government money, you know. I have something though as good as a bag of gold and better," I told him. "My money I am afraid is lost." I don't think the money-matter was understood by the man. I guess he was deaf, for he kept putting his hand, doubled up, to his ears as if he was saying, 'Give us a word here.'"

"It is all right," I said. I thought that I lost on the wreck what money I happened to have, but I had something left worth more than a bag of gold. My deaf friend got things mixed up."

"Did you lose much money?"

"Oh, not so very much, perhaps a hundred dollars or so, but what I did bring away, gold could not buy."

What did "My Captain" mean?

"You let me tell you, Janet. You know well enough what kind of a life I did lead. Got into it thoughtlessly, but still I got into it, and the responsibility I cannot avoid. God knows, though, that I tried hard to get out of this life again and again, but I failed. In the time it was not so easy to get liquor as at home and I got along better, but when I had an opportunity to gratify my appetite, I yielded to the temptation. Well, time went on, and I went into hospital. There I saw a new phase of life. Next to my cot, in my hospital room, I saw a man who should think he was about your age. He was taken prisoner by our men, and as he lay there, I saw that he was a man of adjoining cots, we became very much interested in one another. One thing I wondered at, and that was his self-control and his sunny way of looking at things. I touched on it one day. Said I, talking across from my bed, 'You are a wonder to me.' 'How so?' he said. I told him, 'You have something which I haven't got.' He smiled, 'It can't be a purse of gold for I have only mean confederate scrip in my pocket.' 'No,' I said, 'it isn't that. It is something else. Now, I don't mean to rip out and shoot out an ugly word, but—but I do sometimes. I never hear it from you. I don't want to have my blue days, but I declare some days I can't see anything but my coffin and the chaplain saying his prayers beside it. What is it?' Janet, I shall never forget the light that seemed to spring into his eyes—that is the word, spring; and he said to me, 'I don't think I am all that you say, but if I do have any success, it is because I am helped to do it. It is not because I do anything, but it is Somebody within me that helps me do it.' 'What?' I said. I spoke right out in my hasty way, you know. 'It seems to me what you do here is what you do yourself. It is all 'grin and bear it,' as they say.' He shook his head. He looked at me, and seemed to be looking at a point a great way off. 'If I have any power over myself,' he said, 'it is not that I do it at all. It is—he spoke slowly—the Lord Jesus Christ. Don't you think he can help us?' Well, Janet, that was pretty close firing. I never made any pretensions that way. I was dumb, and the fact was I did not have a chance to make an answer. Don't know as I could have answered if I had tried. The surgeon came up, going his rounds to see how we were getting along, and that prevented all conversation. But that Southerner's words were a ball that struck home. Sometimes, you know, soldiers get bullets in them that they carry to their dying day. That shot I never got rid of and—I don't want to lose it. It struck deep. It set me to thinking. I said to myself, 'That man has in some way a power over himself which I must have.' Oh—I reasoned to myself—'If I could only get the better of my appetite! And why not? Can't the Lord Jesus do that thing for me?' You see what a lot of deep thinking—that is for me—I was doing. But I found it was deep in a way I did not anticipate. I soon got into water that was over my head. I tell you how it happened. In this way, when I asked myself the question, 'Are you just worthy to have this blessing?' That showed me where I was. Oh, I did feel miserable after that. I saw what a great sinner I had been. Well, one day, the chaplain—or some chaplain I believe it was a Christian Commission man came into our ward, and held service there. Did I say one man? There were two of them, and one read from the New Testament. And he spoke about what he had read, talked upon it, and that was a story of a woman who wanted her daughter to be freed from a devil. You know the Saviour said it was not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs. And then she said, 'Yes, Lord, yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs.' What an answer that was, as if she was speaking for me! I felt so unworthy that I seem to be a dog, and thankful to get a crumb. Then those two young men sang something. Well, the sentiment wasn't for me. It was that piece beginning:

"My heart is full of love and treasure, my heart is full of love and treasure, my heart is full of love and treasure, my heart is full of love and treasure."

It was sung to the tune "Home, Sweet Home." Oh, no, the piece wasn't at all for me, but didn't it and the tune make me feel homesick! Why, I hear them singing now—Oh, I couldn't stand it. I couldn't stay in that state of mind. I couldn't keep away from my Saviour. I felt pretty good when I first began to think over what I would like to get from Christ, power more than I had, but I hadn't been drinking for some time and felt quite respectable just then—but my estimation of myself kept going down, down, as I thought upon the subject, and at last I was so low in my feelings that I went like a dog to the Saviour, crawling up to his feet. And, cousin, he—he didn't turn me away. No, he didn't—he gave me what I asked for—gave me his love, and his power—and—you can imagine—"

Here John's emotion checked and then stopped the flow of his voice. When he could speak again, he said, "That's the gold I brought ashore with me?"

The Love of God.

LIKE a cradle, rocking, rocking,
Silent, peaceful, to and fro,—
Like a mother's sweet looks dropping
On the little face below,— Hangs the green earth, swinging, turning,
Jarless, noiseless, safe and slow;
Falls the light of God's face; bending
Down and watching us below.

And as feeble babes that suffer,
Toss and cry, and will not rest,
Are the ones the tender mother
Holds the closest, loves the best;
So when we are weak and wretched,
By our sins weighed down, distressed,
Then it is that God's great patience Holds us closest, loves us best.

the evening I went with Mr. Fyson, one of our pioneer missionaries at Osaka, who was to take the preaching a mission-room. This was one kept by Miss Holland, a lady who, unconsciously with any society, devotes herself, at her own cost, to helping mission work. She had argued that in a country where people are not familiar with the Sabbath's rest, there were many who would like to hear something of Christianity, but might be told, "This is not the right night," and so might delay or not come. But if there was preaching every night, no chance would be missed. She had hired a house close to some market on a very busy street, put in a harmonium, got the place new matted, hung pictures of the Religious Tract Society all round the walls, got a large lantern projecting in front, with the announcement on the transparent paper on the inside, "Teaching of Christ to-night," and the other were depicted a cross and a star. She engaged an old woman to sweep the place, and open and light it every evening. She gets one or two friends to help her with the singing, and has managed to secure a preacher, native or foreign, for every evening for months. Some time, when the venture was first started, the noise and jeering sometimes almost stopped the preacher. But that was inevitable at the beginning of every new work, had nearly passed over. When we arrived we found the three matted mats packed full, and a crowd standing deep in the street. After a hymn, started by two English ladies, Mr. Fyson, sitting at the edge of the room, held the people for over half an hour by what seemed to me a torrent of eloquence as he spoke of the cross. Texts on the subject, painted in great letters on kakemonos, were in front, so that all could read. After singing again, I too was expected to speak, and more difficult task than addressing a crowd with an interpreter I never had, and I think it is impossible to be interesting under such conditions. There may have been two hundred listeners, and the meetings here have already been the means of bringing not a few into the Christian fold. There are many such preaching-places in Osaka, but what are they for almost half a million?

For these efforts confined to the city itself. I walked out with my daughter in the afternoon to a similar meeting three miles from the outskirts of the city, to a stunted village of three thousand souls, employed in making coarse pottery and fishing. We had a most uninteresting way first through narrow streets and past factory chimneys, and then along a raised path through paddy fields until we reached a broad river, and were ferried across to the village. As I turned round I counted for one spot sixty-two factory chimneys, for this is becoming the great cotton-spinning centre. The use of a house was hired for his weekly meeting, to which the head teacher and three senior pupils went with me to carry the picture and help in the singing. The rooms of the house being taken together, about sixty people, chiefly women, soon assembled. Slipping off our shoes at the door, we passed to the inner-end, which was open to the garden. A large colored print of the Ascension was tumbled and pinned up, and a hymn was sung, only joined in by the visitors. Then the teacher spoke for half an hour, and again there was singing, which attracted these people, another address from my daughter explaining the Ascension, and then singing and prayer concluded the meeting. This is a new mission field; there are no Christians yet, but several are interested, and the people were all very quiet and attentive. This is the simple way in which out-stations begin, and the seed is sown. On our return we halted at a tea-house in a village where there was formerly a similar meeting, until the Buddhist priest interfered and threatened anyone who should lend their house for the purpose. This is the kind of local opposition which we must expect from time to time.

Astronomical Religion.*

MOTION is one of the great facts of the physical universe. In astronomy this motion appears in great masses: planets, satellites, and suns rush and wheel so constantly and mightily as to astonish and bewilder us who are so puny, spasmodic, and easily wearied in our action. Tell us of a single object in the sky that stands still. Tell us of a single world that is not traveling faster on its mission than any object that we can impel. From the speed of light to that of Neptune is a large interval; but even Neptune spins along at an average of 12,000 miles an hour. In the heavens, as well as on the earth, activity is the condition of health. Were a world to come to a standstill, it would perish. So the whole azure plain above us is throbbing and heaving with vitality. Never was battlefield more alive with advancing, deploying, retreating hosts. No battle ever takes place among the stars; but, seemingly, all the skillful evolutions and scientific moves that precede a great battle are there. No earthly workshop, no mart of trade, no hive of industry, no steaming fleets of commerce or war, are busier at their work than are the shining fleets that go and come in the blue deep above us. They make no noise about it—at least none that we can hear—but they are vastly executive for all that. Yet there is nothing that seems morbid about this intense activity. Great forces can do great things without straining; and the great careers that are run above us are so within the limits of sanitation that they can be run forever.

Such is the system which God has established and is sustaining in the heavens. Do we not see there an example of what the All-Wise deems the best ordering of things? Have we not pictured there his ideal of how vigorously powers should be exerted, good careers run, and good missions accomplished? Certainly astronomy is not a science that summons to repose—that says to men, "Sleep on now and take your rest." It summons to industry, to struggle, to achievement. One feels like going to work, and working vigorously, for very sympathy, as he gazes away at the universal and splendid executiveness that reigns and triumphs throughout the celestial spaces. The swift and ever-rushing spheres rebuke his idleness, his languor, his feebleness.

*From The Stars of God, by E. F. Burr, D.D., LL.D. A book that should be in the hands of every student of astronomy. Valuable alike as a scientific work and for the deep, religious feeling that breathes in every page. Cloth binding, 244 pages. The Student Publishing Co., Hartford, Ct., publishers.

BLANCHE BURPEE. Mr. HENRY ECKFORD, the noted English Specialist, has stated repeatedly that he considers "BLANCHE BURPEE" the finest of all the famous Sweet Peas that he has originated. Flowers of the purest white, three and four on a stem, of extra giant size and grand substance.

DOROTHY TENNANT. Of large, expanded form, the flowers are exceedingly pretty and attractive. Standards a deep rosy mauve, with wings of bluish mauve. Very distinct and extra fine.

LADY PENZANCE. The standard is a beautiful laced-pink, touching orange, while the wings are a darker pink. Truly a superb flower, of large size and most exquisite color.

NEW LOTTIE ECKFORD. This is the improved new strain. Flowers are very large and remarkably beautiful, having a white ground delicately edged and suffused with lavender blue.

ROYAL ROBE. This is undoubtedly the best soft pink to date. A very lovely flower of large size; an exquisite variety.

STANLEY. Large, handsome flowers produced abundantly in fours on long stems and are of a rich dark maroon. Exceptionally fine for bouquets. This is by far the finest dark variety.

SPECIAL SUPERFINE MIXED. This mixture contains only the best Eckford New Sweet Peas. It is a choice blending of seventeen superb large-flowered new named varieties.

The First and Only Dwarf Sweet Pea,—Burpee's "CUPID"

GROWS ONLY FIVE INCHES HIGH! THE FLORAL WONDER OF THE AGE!

A POT-PLANT OF CUPID.—From a Photograph.

CUPID,—the greatest novelty ever known in flowers,—has won the highest honors possible in Europe. We had plants grown in pots exhibited at the meeting of the Royal Horticultural Society, in London, England, where, by unanimous vote of the Committee, it received an Award of Merit—the highest honor that can be conferred upon a new variety. We exhibited also in Paris, France, on July 11, 1895, at the Société National d'Horticulture, where it received a First-class Certificate, as a distinct novelty of surpassing merit.

"CUPID." The foliage is very dark green; blossoms pure waxy-white, of unequalled substance, and full size. The plant does not grow over five inches high, and never more than twelve to fifteen inches in diameter. The stems are about four inches long, bearing two or three blossoms, all very near the end of the stem. It is a wonderfully free bloomer, and carpets the ground with a mass of white from May until November.

In regular-size packets (each containing twenty seeds), per pkt. 25 cts.; five pkts. for $1.00; twelve pkts. for $2.00, postpaid, by mail, to any address.

In half-size packets (ten seeds each), per pkt. 15 cts.; two pkts. for 25 cts.; ten pkts. for $1.00.

A Grand Painting of SWEET PEAS

Size 13 x 16 1/2 inches, in 14 Colors.

BY PAUL DE LONGPRÉ.

The great artist visited FORDHOOK FARM during midsummer, when the large area of Sweet Peas gave rare beauty to our Ten Grounds. Amid these charming scenes, glowing with life and color and sweet with delicate perfume of Sweet Peas, the famous painter of nature has caught the most elusive charm of leaf and flower, and transfigured them in perishable life to his painting. This masterpiece of the highest art has been produced in fourteen colors, making a picture that for chaste elegance it would be impossible to overpraise. So faithful has been the work of the lithographer that not even a trained critic could detect the difference from the original (which cost $250.00), except by the minutest examination.

It is indeed a rare transcript from nature—a dream in colors that should adorn the walls of every home.

In order that all may secure a copy of this dainty work of art we will sell it (to our customers) at 10 cents per copy, mailed in a pasteboard tube; regular price 20 cents.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

WASHINGTON FOR GOD.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Luke 24: 47, "Beginning at Jerusalem."

HERE it is," said the driver, and we all instantly and excitedly rose in the carriage to catch the first glimpse of Jerusalem, so long the joy of the whole earth.

That city, coronetted with temple and palace and radiant, whether looked up at from the valley of Jehoshaphat or gazed at from adjoining hills, was the capital of a great nation. Clouds of incense had hovered over it. Chariots of kings had rolled through it. Battering-rams of enemies had thundered against it. There Isaiah prophesied, and Jeremiah lamented, and David reigned, and Paul preached, and Christ was martyred. Most interesting city ever built since masonry rung its first trowel, or plumb-line measured its first wall, or royalty swung its first sceptre. What Jerusalem was to the Jewish kingdom, Washington is to our own country—the capital, the place to which all the tribes come up, the great national heart whose throb sends life or death through the body politic, clear out to the geographical extremities.

What the resurrected Christ said in my text to his disciples, when he ordered them to start on the work of Gospelization, "beginning at Jerusalem," it seems to me God says now, in his Providence, to tens of thousands of Christians in this city. Start for the evangelization of America, "beginning at Washington." America is going to be taken for God. If you do not believe it, take your hat now and leave, and give room to some man or woman who does believe it. As surely as God lives, and he is able to do as he says he will, this country will be evangelized from the mouth of the Potomac to the mouth of the Oregon, from the Highlands of the Neversink to the Golden Horn, from Baffin's Bay to the Gulf of Mexico, and Christ will walk every lake, whether be-stormed or placid, and be transfigured on every mountain, and the night skies, whether they hover over groves of magnolia or over Alaskan glacier, shall be filled with angelic overture of "Glory to God and good-will to men."

Again and again does the Old Book announce that all the earth shall see the salvation of God, and as the greater includes the lesser, that takes America gloriously in. Can you not see that if America is not taken for God by his consecrated people, it will be taken for Apollyon! The forces engaged on both sides are so tremendous that it cannot be a drawn battle. If America is not taken for God, the American Sabbath will perish and this nation be handed over to Herods, and Hildebrand, and Usedom, and Nemour, and hateful power, and Alcoholism will reign, his mouth foaming with domestic and national curse, and crime will lift its unhindered knife of assassination, and rattle keys of worst burglary, and wave torch of widest conflagration, and our cities be tempests of fire and brimstone, and one tidal wave of abomination will surge across the continent, or our Sabbaths will take on more sanctity, and the newspapers will become apocalyptic wings of benediction, and penitentiaries will be abandoned for lack of occupants, and holiness and happiness, twin son and daughter of heaven, shall walk through the land, and Christ reign over this nation either in person or by agency so glorious that the whole country will be one clear, resounding echo of heaven. It will be one or the other. By the throne of him who liveth forever and ever, I declare it will be the latter. If the Lord will help me, as he always does, — Blessed be his glorious name! — I will show you how a mighty work of grace begun at Washington would have a tendency to bring the whole continent to God, and before this century closes.

William the Conqueror ordered the curfew, the custom of ringing the bell at midnight, at which all the fires on the hearths were to be banked, and all the lights extinguished, and all the people retire to their pillows. I pray God that the curfew of this century may not be sounded, and the fires be banked, and the lights extinguished, as the clock strikes the midnight hour that divides the nineteenth century from the twentieth century, until this beloved land, which was to most of us a cradle and which will be to most of us a grave, shall come into the full possession of him who is so glorious that William the Conqueror could not be compared to him, even the One who rideth forth, "conquering and to conquer."

Why would it be especially advantageous if a mighty work of grace started here, "beginning at Washington?" First, because this city is on the border between the North and the South. It is neither Northern nor Southern. It commingles the two climates. It brings together the two styles of population. It is not only right, but beautiful, that people should have especial love for the latitude where they were born and brought up. With what loving accentuation the Alabamian speaks of his orange groves! And the man from Massachusetts is sure to let you know that he comes from the land of the Adamses, — Samuel, and John, and John Quincy. Did you ever know a Virginian or Ohioan whose face did not brighten when he announced himself from the Southern or Northern State of Presidents? If a man does not like his native clime, it is because while he lived there, he did not behave well. This capital stands where, by its locality and its political influence, it stretches forth one hand toward the North and the other toward the South, and a mighty work of grace starting here would probably be a national awakening. Georgia would clasp the hand of New Hampshire, and Maine the hand of Louisiana, and California the hand of New York, and say, "Come, let us go up and worship the God of Nations, the Christ of Golgotha, the Holy Ghost of the pentecostal three thousands." It has often been said that the only way the North and the South will be brought into complete accord, is to have a war with some foreign nation, in which both sections, marching side by side, would forget everything but the foe to be overcome. Well, if you wait for such a foreign conflict, you will wait until all this generation is dead, and perhaps wait forever. The war that will make the sections forget past controversies is a war against unrighteousness, such as a universal religious awakening would declare. What we want is a battle for souls, in which about forty million Northerners and Southerners shall be on the same side, and shoulder to shoulder. In no other city on the continent can such a war be declared so appropriately, for all the other great cities are either Northern or Southern. This is neither, or, rather, it is both.

Again, it would be especially advantageous if a mighty work of grace started here, because more representative men are in Washington than in any other city between the oceans. Of course there are accidents in politics, and occasionally there are men who get into the Senate and House of Representatives and other important places who are fitted for the positions in neither head nor heart: but this is exceptional and more exceptional now than in other days. There is not a drunkard in the National Legislature, although there were times when Kentucky, Virginia, Delaware, Illinois, New York, and Massachusetts had men in Senate or House of Representatives who went maudlin and staggering drunk across those high places. Never nobler group of men sat in Senate or House of Representatives than sat there yesterday and will sit there to-morrow, while the highest judiciary, without exception, has now upon its bench men beyond criticism for good morals and mental endowment. So in all departments of official position, with here and there an exception, are to-day the brainiest men and most honorable men of America. Now, suppose the Holy Ghost power should fall upon this city, and these men from all parts of America should suddenly become pronounced for Christ! Do you say the effect would be electrical? More than that: it would be omnipotent! Do you say that such learned and potent men are not wrought upon by religious influence? That shows that you have not observed what has been going on. Commodore Foote, representing the navy; General Grant and Robert E. Lee, representing the Northern and Southern armies; Chief Justice Chase, representing the Supreme Court; the Frelinghuysens, Theodore and Frederick, representing the United States Senate; William Pennington and scores of others, representing the House of Representatives, have surrendered to that Gospel, which before this winter is out, will, in this capital of the American nation, if we are faithful in our prayers and exertions, turn into the kingdom of God men of national and international power, their tongues of eloquence becoming the tongues of fire in another Pentecost. There are on yonder hill those who by the grace of God will become John Knoxes, and Chrysostoms, and Fenelons, and Bourdeleaus, when once regenerated. There is an illusion I have heard in prayer meetings and heard in pulpits, that a soul is a soul—one soul worth as much as another. I deny it. The soul of a man who can bring a thousand or ten thousand other souls into the kingdom of God, is worth a thousand times or ten thousand times more than the soul of a man who can bring no one into the kingdom. A great outpouring of the Holy Spirit in this capital, reaching the chief men of America, would be of more value to earth and heaven than in any other part of the nation, because it would reach all the States, cities, towns, and neighborhoods of the continent. Oh, for the outstretched right arm of God Almighty in the salvation of this capital.

Some of us remember 1857, when, at the close of the worst monetary distress this country has ever felt, compared with which the hard times of the last three years were a boom of prosperity, right on the heels of that complete prostration came an awakening in which five hundred thousand people were converted in different States of the Union. Do you know who one of its chief powers was demonstrated in Washington. Do you know on what street? This street. Do you know what church? This church. I picked an old book a few days ago, and startled, and thrilled, and enchanted to read these words, written at that time by the Washington correspondent of a New York paper. He wrote: "The First Presbyterian Church can scarce contain the people. Requests are daily preferred an interest in the prayers offered, and reading of these forms one of the tender and most effective features of the meeting. Particular pains are taken to disclaim and exclude everything like sectarian feeling. General astonishment is felt at the unexpected rapidity with which the work thus far proceeded, and we are beginning to anticipate the necessity of opening another church." Why, my hearers, have that again, and more than that? There are many thousands more of infants now than then. Beside that, since then the telephone, with its semi-presence, and the swift cable car, for assembling the people. I believe that the mightiest revival of religion that this city has ever seen is yet to come, and the walls will tremble from Capitoline Hill to the boundaries on all sides with the footsteps of God as he comes to awaken and parry and save these great populations. People of Washington, meet us next Thursday night, at half-past seven o'clock, to pray for this coming of the Holy Ghost—for a pentecostal three thousand, that I have referred to, but thirty thousand. Such a fire as that would kindle a light that would be seen from the sleets crunching through the snows of Labrador to the Caribbean Sea, where the wild winds are born. Let our cry be that of Habakkuk, the blank verse poet of the bible: "O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years, in the midst of years make known; in wrath remember mercy." Let the battle-cry be, Washington for God! the United States for Christ! America for God! the world for God! We are all tired of skirmishing. Let us begin on a general engagement. We are tired of fishing with hook and line. With the sweep of the Gospel net let us take many thousands. This vast work must begin somewhere. Why not here? See one must give the rallying cry, why not I, one of the Lord's servants? By providential arrangement, I am every week in sermon communication with every city, town, and neighborhood of this country, and I now give the watchword to North and South, and East and West. Hear and see it, all people—this call to forward movement, this call to repentance and faith, this call to a continental awakening!

This generation will soon be out of sight. Where are the mighty men of the past to tread your Pennsylvania avenue and speak in yonder National Legislature, and decide the stupendous questions of the supreme judicatory? Ask the sleepers in the Congressional Cemetery. Ask the marble monuments all over the land. Their tongues are speechless, their eyes closed, their faces folded, their opportunities gone, their destiny fixed. How soon Time prorogues parliaments, and adjourns senates, and disbands cabinets, and empties pulpits, and dismisses generations! What we would do, we must do quickly or not at all. I call upon people who cannot come forth from their sick-beds to implore the heavens in our behalf from their midnight pillows, and I call upon the aged who do not, even by the help of their staff, enter the churches, to spend their last day on earth in supplicating the salvation of this nation, and I call upon all men and women who have been in furnaces of trouble, as was Shadrach, and among lions, as was Daniel, and in dungeons of trouble, as was Jeremiah, to join in the prayer, and let the Church of God everywhere lay hold of the

A mighty Arm that moves nations. Then Senators of the United States will announce to the State legislatures that sent thee here, and Members of the House of Representatives will report to the Congressional districts that elected them, and the my thousands of men and women now are here engaged in the many departments of national service will write home, telling of the labors of the country that the Lord is here, and that he is on the march for the redemption of America. Hallelujah! the Lord is coming! I hear the rumbling of the chariot wheels. I feel on my cheeks the breath of the white horses that draw thee, Victor! I see the flash of his lanterns through the long night of the world's sin and sorrow! We want in this country, on a larger scale, that which other centuries have seen of God's workings: as in the Reformation of the sixteenth century, when Martin Luther and Philip Melancthon led on; as in the awakening of the seventeenth century, when Bunyan and Flavel, and Baxter led on; as in the awakening of the eighteenth century, when Tennant, and Edwards, and the Wesleys led on; as in the awakening of 1857, led on by Matthew Simpson, the seraphic Methodist, and Bishop MacLivaine, the apostolic Episcopalian, and Albert Barnes, the consecrated Presbyterian, and others, it is as good, in all denominations. Oh, will not some of those glorious souls of the past come down and help us? Come down off your thrones, Nettleton, and Finney, and Daniel Baker, and Edward Lyson, and Truman Osborne, and Earle, and Knapp, and Inskip, and Archibald Alexander,—that Alexander the Great of the Christian Churches. Come down! How can you rest up there when the world is dying for lack of the Gospel? Come down and agonize with us in prayer. Come down and help us preach in our pulpits. Come down and inspire our courage and faith. Heaven can get along without you better than we can. But more than all (and overwhelmed with reverent emotion we ask it), come, thou of the deeply-dyed garments of Bozrah, traveling in the greatness of thy strength, mighty to save! Lord God of Joshua! Let the sun of this century stand still above Gibeon and the moon above the valley of Ajalon until we can whip out the five kings of hell, tumbling them down the precipices as the other five kings went over the rocks of Bethoron. Ha! Ha! It will so surely be done that I cannot restrain the laugh of triumph. From where the seaweed is tossed on the beach by the stormy Atlantic, to the sands veiled by the quiet Pacific, this country will be Emanuel's land, the work beginning at Washington, if we have the faithful holy push and the consecration requisite. First of all, we ministers must get right. That was a startling utterance of Dr. Swinock, when he said, "It is a dreadful thing to fall into hell from under the pulpit, but, oh! how dreadful a thing to slip thither out of the pulpit." That as an all-suggestive thing that Paul wrote to the Corinthians: "lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway." That as an inspiring motto with which Whitehead sealed all his letters: "We seek the stars." Lord God! Wake up all our pulpits, and then it will be as when Venn preached and it was said that men fell before the Word like slacked lime. Let us all, laymen and clergymen, to the work. What Washington wants most of all is an old-fashioned revival of religion, but on a larger scale, so that the world will be impelled to say, as of old, "We never saw it on this fashion!" But remember there is a human side as well as a Divine side to a revival. Those of us brought up in the country know what is called "a rising," the neighbors gathered together to lift the heavy frame for a new house, after the timbers are ready to be put into their places. It is dangerous work, and there are many accidents. The neighbors had gathered for such a raising, and the beams had all been fitted to their places except one, and that very heavy. That one, on the long pikes of the men, had almost reached its place, when something went wrong, and the men could hoist it no higher. But if it did not go in its place it would fall back upon the men who were lifting it. It had already begun to settle back. The boss-carpenter shouted, "Lift men or die! All together! Yo—heave!" With mightier push they tried to send the beam to its place, but failed. Still they held on, all the time their strength lessening. The wives, and mothers, and daughters stood in horror looking on. Then the boss-carpenter shouted to the women, "Come and help!" They came, and womanly arms became the arms of giants, for they were lifting to save the lives of husbands, and fathers and sons, as well as their own. Then the boss-carpenter mounted one of the beams and shouted, "Now! Altogether! Lift or die! Yo—heave!" And with a united effort that almost burst the blood-vessels, the great beam went to its place, and a wild huzza was heard. That is the way it sometimes seems in the churches. Temples of righteousness are to be reared, but there is a halt, a stop, a catch somewhere. A few are lifting all they can, but we want more hands at this raising, and more hearts. More Christian men to help, and more Christian women to reinforce. If the work fail, it means the death of many souls. All together! Men and women of God! Lift or die! The top-stone must come to its place "with shoutings of grace, grace unto it." God is ready to do his part; are we ready to do our part? There is work not only for the knee of prayer, but for the shoulder of upheaval.

And now I would like to see this hour that which I have never seen, but hope to see—a whole audience saved under one flash of the Eternal Spirit. Before you go out of any of these doors, enter the door of Mercy. Father and mother, come in and bring your children with you. Newly-married folks, consecrate your lifetime to God, and be married for eternity as well as time.

Young man, you will want God before you get through this world, and you want him now. Young woman, without God this is a hard world for women. One and all, wherever you sit or stand, I lift my voice so that you can hear it, out in the corridors and on the street, and say, in the words of the Mediterranean ship captain, "Call upon thy God, if so be that God will think upon us, that we perish not." Oh, what news to tell, what news to relate to your old father and mother, what news to telegraph your friends on the other side of the mountains, what news with which to thrill your loved ones in heaven! It was of such news that a man read in a noonday meeting in Philadelphia. He arose, and unrolling a manuscript, read:

Where'er we meet, you always say
What's the news? what's the news?
Pray what's the order of the day?
What's the news? what's the news?
Oh! I have got good news to tell:
My Saviour hath done all things well,
And triumphed over death and hell,
That's the news! that's the news!
The Lamb was slain on Calvary,
That's the news! that's the news!
To set a world of sinners free,
That's the news! that's the news!
And now, if anyone should say,
What's the news? what's the news?
Oh, tell him you've begun to pray—
That's the news! that's the news!—
That you have joined the conquering band,
And now with joy at God's command,
You're marching to the better land,
That's the news! that's the news!

All Loved "Grandma" Moody.

Sweet Memories at Northfield of the Dear Old Christian Lady, who has Gone from Earth—Mr. Moody's Boyhood recalled.

In the death of Mrs. Betsey Moody, as announced last week in these columns, many thousands of good Christian men and women who had known and loved her, feel that they have lost a very dear friend. To everyone in Northfield, Mass., where the Moody Institute and Training Schools are situated, she was familiarly known as "Grandma" Moody, and despite her ninety years, her bright, alert intellect and kindly, loving ways were such as to endear her to all who called at the old Moody homestead. It has been the custom for almost every visitor to Northfield to make a pilgrimage to the house where the world-wide Evangelist was born, and where his mother spent her declining days. It is a plain and substantial frame-house, about a gunshot up the hill to the eastward, from the Evangelist's own home. On a seat which surrounds the stately tree in front, Mr. Moody was wont to sit, in an earlier part of his public career, and prepare some of his sermons, the echoes of which have gone around the world, and which have led so many souls into peace and liberty.

Betsey Holton, afterwards Mrs. Moody, was born in 1805. Her birthplace is situated not far distant from the Mount Hermon Schools, across the Connecticut river; so that her life has been spent almost in sight of her native home. Miss Holton was married at the age of twenty-three to Mr. Edwin Moody, who had come across the hills and settled in Northfield. Dwight Lyman (the well-known evangelist), was the sixth child of Mr and Mrs. Moody. The husband and father died in 1841, leaving his widow with seven young children; and twins were born to her a month after his death. The farm which the husband cultivated, in addition to the exercise of his handicraft as a brick-mason, was encumbered with a mortgage; and the widow was left in very strained circumstances. But her trust was in God, and she addressed herself to the task of providing for her little ones. One who knows her well says: "Her life was a simple, plain, mother's life in a country place, marked principally by the struggle in her widowhood to maintain her nine children. And she did it nobly." Her brothers helped her to retain the farm. The family were kept together until they were able to support themselves.

Many of those who heard Mr. D. L. Moody preach, on his first evangelistic mission, will recollect the pathetic references he was wont to make to the home-life. They will not soon forget the touching story of the elder son, who was for a time a "wandering boy," and how the younger ones were frequently sent by the widowed mother to the post office to see if any letter had come from him. Then there was the return, the recognition, the forgiveness, and the welcome.

"Mother Moody," as the lay-students familiarly called her, was wonderfully hale and well-preserved. As she sat in her arm-chair, receiving her visitors, with the snows of age upon her head, she made a goodly picture. Though in her ninetieth year, her activity, mental and physical, was but little abated. Until lately, she was a great reader. The celebration of her birthday was always a great event in the Northfield home. Neighbors and friends vied with each other in bringing their tributes of love to a brother beloved and a mother revered.

Never does Mr. Moody seem so royally grand as when moving among his townsmen, giving and receiving tokens of respect. His mother's birthdays, like his own, were always widely remembered. Of one occasion, a friend wrote: "Not alone did his old friends and his kindred come up to Marquand Hall, which was opened for a public reception, but invitations was sent out to a host of other friends in different parts of the land, to be present on this glad occasion. The day was one of the fairest of winter days, and a general holiday was given to the Mount Hermon boys and the Northfield students. All these proteges of the Evangelist were present, and sang most enthusiastically songs of gladness and rejoicing.

"In one room of the old home were the simple articles used by the family in their days of poverty, speaking in mute eloquence of privation and closest economy; the churn, the spinning-wheel, the foot-mat—a 'coat-of-arms' most significant. But of greater value than all was the old family Bible, on the pine centre-table, showing that it had been in constant use through the generations.

"Mrs. Moody's cheerful spirit shone through her keen black eyes. She is of the seventh generation from William Holton, Ipswich, England, who came to this country at the age of twenty-two, and settled in Hartford, Connecticut. His name is on the 'Forefathers' Monument.' It is a notable feature in his history that he was the first to introduce a bill for the suppression of the liquor traffic. Good stock for an evangelist to spring from!"

At the funeral of Mrs. Betsey Moody, which took place at East Northfield, in the Congregational Church, hundreds of people were moved to tears, as Mr. Moody, the evangelist, standing over the open coffin which held the body of his mother, paid a touching tribute to her life of self-sacrifice and devotion, and recounted the story of his own early life of privation and other incidents which the public have never heard. "She made our home, poor though it was," he said, "the best place on earth to us. She taught us that poverty was no disgrace. During the first years of her widowhood, she wept herself to sleep night after night, and we never knew of it until later years."

He told of their struggles with poverty, and then read from the Bible and from a book of verses given his mother by the late Dr. Everett. Turning to the face of the dead, in a gentle voice he said, as he shook his head, "God bless you, mother, we love you still." Many in the audience were unable to control their grief and the sobs nearly drowned the voice of the evangelist. The funeral service will long be remembered at Northfield.

Faith Encouraged.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 23. Luke 8: 43-55. Golden Text. Luke 8: 48. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

FOR two reasons, first, that he might teach his disciples, and secondly, that he might deliver one poor man who was possessed with a "legion" of devils, or demons (Mark 5: 9), Jesus had crossed the lake of Galilee, and landed for a little time on the coasts of the Gadarenes. The inhabitants of the country, when they saw the man who had been a terror to them, "sitting and clothed and in his right mind" were far more afraid than they had been of the man himself, when he was possessed with a legion of devils. Men are more at home with the devil than with God! With united voice they besought Jesus to depart from them; "for they were Taken With Great Fear."

It is an awful sign of human depravity when men get so accustomed to the presence of the enemy that they mourn over the departure of devils, and beg Jesus to depart from them. And yet every sinner who puts off decision for Christ, after once hearing for himself the message of salvation, is guilty of this terrible sin.

And the Son of God does not resist such blasphemous and suicidal prayers. He went up into the ship and returned again. He will never force himself or his salvation upon unwilling sinners. Every man who rejects Christ must take the tremendous and eternal responsibility of doing so, and his rejected Saviour will bear witness against him at the last day: "How often would I have gathered" you (Matt 23: 37), but "ye will not come unto Me, that ye might have life." (John 5: 40.)

While some reject, others eagerly receive God's Messiah: when he was returned to the other side of the lake, into Galilee, "the multitude welcomed him, for they were all waiting for him." But some among them had special need; Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue, was one: "he fell down at Jesus' feet, and besought him that he would come into his house: for he had one only daughter, and she lay dying." Such an appeal met with a ready response from Jesus: He went with him and the multitudes thronged him. They all wanted to see and hear, but with many of them it ended there; and when Jesus left them to go elsewhere, they remained behind, ready for the next new thing. Their curiosity was satisfied, they were not behind the times; they knew all that was going on, but nothing touched them; Jesus, his Person and his ministry were all outside of them, and nothing was left them but a responsibility to which they were not alive, that Jesus of Nazareth had passed by, and they knew not the time of their visitation. (John 5: 14.)

One there was among this crowd who had staked everything upon the venture and had made. A woman extremely unclean. (Num. 5: 1-3), and therefore not permitted to worship in the temple, condemned to be set apart and separated from others, she nevertheless broke through all restrictions, and came along with the multitude to seek help from Jesus. She had doubtless heard of those who had sought only to touch the hem of his garment, and that "as many as touched were made perfectly whole" (Matt. 14: 36), and she said within herself, "If I may but touch his garment, I shall be whole." (Matt. 9: 20.) It was her only hope; so, intent had she been on being healed, and set free from the ceremonial restrictions which kept her a leper among her fellow-men, that she had spent all which she had on physicians and remedies, and after seeing all her little fortune dwindle away, and finding that she was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse (Mark 5: 26), that she was not only sick, not only unclean, but that also starvation stared her in the face.

Her case was desperate and she staked all upon the venture. If she was discovered, she might be hindered from coming to Jesus, or joining at all in the press of people which surrounded him. But he would not reject her, had he not touched the very leper and he was cleansed? So she came in the press behind, and touched his garment, and it was not in vain. The grievous humbling disease of twelve years standing, which had rendered her unclean, was instantaneously healed. "And she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague."

But Jesus felt something, too. He knew, and the woman knew, that a ransomed soul had touched its Saviour; and that the life-power of the Son of man had healed a hopelessly sick body. The same eyes which found out Peter in the judgment hall, were turned upon this woman now, she "saw that she was not hid," and came "trembling," for she had doubtless counted on getting away without notice or remark—and falling down before him, she declared to him before all the people, for what cause she had touched him and was healed immediately. "Did she fear the people or did she fear the Lord Jesus?" Probably the people. But where Jesus is trusted, he may be trusted with people, too. She had nothing to fear from him. "Daughter," he said to her, "thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace and be whole of thy plague." (Mark 7: 34.)

This whole incident occurred when Jesus was on his way to the house of Jairus, and just at this very moment when he spoke these last words to the healed woman, a messenger came from the house of the ruler of the synagogue, saying to him as he stood there, perhaps counting the moments until Jesus should move on: "Thy daughter is dead: trouble not the Master." Did there arise in his heart the bitter reflection: "If only Jesus had hurried and left this woman till afterwards, he might have been in time to heal my daughter, and now it is too late; and I, by coming to him, have lost the last few moments with my child." Had Jesus made a mistake? Would it have been consistent with his heart of kindness to have put off the woman until he had healed the child? There was no confusion, no hurry, no pressure about the movements of Jesus, all were regulated from above, by the hand of his Father. "He hath made all things beautiful in his time" (Eccl. 3: 11, R.V.), and the beauty ceases as soon as we will force things into our time. Jesus had a word of comfort for the father. It had been no accident, but ordered from above, that he should see how the faith of the woman had been honored, and now, in presence of death itself, he is called upon to believe. "Fear not, believe only and she shall be made whole." Startling words coming upon the announcement that she was already dead! But Jesus has life in himself (John 5: 26), and the father's silence was proof that he did not dispute the Master's word.

None might enter into that chamber of death and resurrection but such as could count upon Jesus; he excluded all but Peter, James, John, and the father and mother of the maiden. The hired mourners, and all who saw only death as though it were victorious, must remain outside. Jesus said to them: "Weep not; she is not dead, but sleepeth." "Had they believed him, they would not have gone by appearances, but, in their unbelief, they laughed him to scorn. He could do no mighty work where unbelief reigned (Matt. 13: 58; Mark 6: 5, 6), and he put out of the room these scoffers at the Son of Man. Now, he was free, and taking the little lifeless hand, he said, "Maid, arise." And the spirit came again, and she arose straightway, and he commanded that something be given her to eat. The parents were astonished, and now the father could doubtless understand the Lord's dealings with him, in permitting the delay for the healing of the woman. What were a few moments more or less to him who could conquer death itself? But let us also learn the lesson. Wherever Jesus is, there he is Master of the situation. Wherever we are with him, not doubting, touching him like the woman, silently waiting upon him as Jairus did, we, too, are made by him masters of the situation. All things are possible to him, and all things are possible to him that believeth: it answers then to wait on him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

A GAIN two miracles form the subject of the lesson, and, like those of last week's lesson, one is a miracle of healing and the other of resurrection from the dead. The scene is Capernaum and Christ has come back there after one of his tours in Galilee. It had been an absence rich in teaching and in wonderful works. The people were no nearer understanding the young Teacher, and were being continually surprised at his doing something that he was not expected to do. His friendliness and kindness were not the least of these surprises. Unlike John the Baptist, he seemed to seek contact with human beings. He was approachable, genial, companionable, never holding aloof, putting on no ascetic manner. A Pharisee had invited him to a feast and though the Pharisees were his opponents and he had denounced them, he cheerfully accepted the invitation. At the feast, a woman of sinful life had approached and had wept tears of sorrow and love over him, and, to the surprise of the Pharisee, she had not been repulsed. Taken to task for this apparent indifference to the character of the woman, Christ had answered affably, and with logical force justified his conduct. Messengers from John the Baptist had come to him asking him for a definite declaration of himself. He kept them there while he performed several miracles, and then bade them tell John what they had witnessed, leaving him to draw his own conclusions. Yet he knew that he was not understood, and his parable of the Sower, delivered during this journey, showed that he was aware of the causes which prevented his words taking effect. Finally, in crossing the Lake there had been a new exhibition of his power, when he hushed the storm by a word.

Arriving at his home in Capernaum Christ is surrounded by an eager crowd of admirers and friends. He is talking with them and answering questions, when the great man of the town, Jairus, the ruler of the synagogue, breaks in upon them. His little daughter is sick and he wants Jesus to lay his hands on her and heal her. His words indicate his intense anxiety. The miracle of the Centurion's servant, of which he must have known and other miracles in Capernaum had inspired him with faith in Christ's power. In his distress, he does not stand on his dignity, but great man as he is, asks for help. Matthew says that even when he came, he knew that his daughter was dead, but Matthew was doubtless anticipating the knowledge that came later, when the messengers from the sick room brought their report. In each of the three stories, the Evangelist inserts the parenthetic miracle. Jesus on the way to the house of Jairus, is accompanied by the crowd, eager to see a miracle worked. On the way, an afflicted woman stealthily joins the throng and eddies her way nearer and nearer to the great Healer. She has a purpose. Mark, whose story is more full of detail than the others enables us to understand her case. Ill twelve years, undergoing painful treatment, spending her money and to no purpose. Worse, rather than better, she spairs, but she hears of the wonder healings Christ has wrought and determines to apply to him for help. She thinks that even a touch of Christ's garment will suffice to cure her. The thing can easily be done in that crowd and when she is near enough, she puts out her hand, touches the loose robe he wears and instantly feels the life-giving result. She knows she is healed; but has she stolen the blessing? Her mind misgives her. Christ knows and stops in his walk, asking who has touched him. Peter reminds him that many had done so, but Christ knows the difference of the touch. Like many who hear the Gospel now and do not apply to themselves, many had derived no benefit from touching Christ. Then the woman comes forward trembling and admits what she did, declares that she is healed and receives a benediction. People of our time are often distressed by having no assurance that Christ has accepted them. If they had the confidence of the woman, they would not be worried. They did not even ask Christ for the boon, believed in his power and put out her hand and took the blessing. Christ had said before that the kingdom of heaven would suffer violence and the violent would take it by force. This woman's act was an instance. The mixture of boldness and timidity in her affected him strongly and words to her were sweetly tender.

By this time the news came that the child whom Christ was on his way to heal, was dead. Jairus is told that it is no use now to trouble Jesus. People often think so now about profligates and criminals. They are so sunk in depravity that nothing can save them, but it is never so. To aver that anyone is beyond Christ's power. At the house he says of the father, as he said afterwards of Lazarus, that he was asleep not dead. But there was scornful laugh. The people there who had seen the child, were not likely to take sleep for death. But it proved that Christ's power to be after all more than sleep than death, for though the spirit had departed, it returned at his command. The word to Jairus is the word he now utters to people who think his power is limited. "Fear not, only believe."

I perceive that virtue has gone out of many a friend calling on the late Pastor C. Spurgeon one evening during a visit to London was sorry to find him very much downcast. He asked him if he was, but Mr. Spurgeon said he was quite well. They talked for some time, but there was no cheer in the conversation. The humorous remarks and witty sallies which usually made the great preacher's company delightful were absent. "I am afraid," said the visitor, "you have heard some bad news." Mr. Spurgeon said he had not and made a perceptible effort to shake off his depression, but he failed and, leaning back in his chair, he sighed heavily. "The fact is," said he, "this has been a day at the Tabernacle. I appoint a day when I will be there to see any one who wants counsel. There has been a succession of despairing persons there—people who are sure they have committed unpardonable sin and people who are in distress from other causes. I have been cheering one after the other, the whole of the day. I think I must have given away all my cheerfulness. Well, if they have it, I am glad. Poor creatures! Some of them needed it badly."

She is not dead but sleepeth. "If sleep be a metaphor for death," says a great writer, we may well consider what happens in sleep. The body lies still, the muscles are relaxed, the weary limbs are at rest. But the mind is not always resting with it. It is roaming through familiar scenes, seeing strange sights, actively participating in imaginary conversations. When we wake up in the morning, we must remember that then, too, we are referring to the body only. As in sleep, the spirit may be passing through the most wonderful experiences. As in dreams, we sometimes seem to live years in a night, so in death, we may see and learn infinite things in a brief space.

PIONEER MISSIONARY DAYS.

How the Lord's Work Grows in Consecrated Hands—A Frame Shed that Afterwards Became a Christian College—One Missionary's Eventful Life.

TO a multitude of Christian lives there comes at times the personal experience of the great spiritual truth that was taught in our Saviour's parable of the mustard seed. They have observed with supreme delight how the Lord's spiritual work in faithful hands has expanded from small beginnings beyond all expectations. What could never have been accomplished by merely human means, has been done by divine help, with the accompaniments of prayer, energetic effort, and the influence of personal example. Indeed, if the history of almost all the great religious, philanthropic and benevolent enterprises of our day were closely scrutinized, it would be found that almost all had their origin in a single grain of spiritual effort, no larger comparatively than a mustard seed.

REV. W. W. WHEELER.

This is illustrated in the career of Rev. W. W. Wheeler, a Missionary of the American Sunday School Union in Wisconsin, more clearly, probably than in that of many others, although all who are engaged in the Lord's work have at times had a personal experience of this nature. Mr. Wheeler's whole life from early manhood has been devoted to Christian service. One of his most grateful recollections of early work relates to Berea College. During the first years of his work in Berea, he, with Mrs. Wheeler and Prof. Rogers, lived in a frame structure of the pioneer order. The lower part of the house was used as a boarding hall, where the early students were accommodated. Some little distance off was a frame school house (shown in one of the photographs on this page), where the faithful workers opened an "Academy and College." It was an ambitious title for such a modest structure, but the field was promising, and soon the scholars came in increasing numbers. This building was afterward replaced by small "Recitation Buildings," which was a distinct step forward. That was many years ago. To-day, where the unpretentious frame school house once stood, stands Berea College, a splendid, spacious edifice, with a "Ladies' Hall" and a "Boarding Hall," sufficiently large to accommodate all the students. Thus has the grain of mustard seed been multiplied, and the insignificant beginning, undertaken in faith by two godly men and one woman, has become a recognized and influential factor for the extension of the Gospel in America.

W. W. Wheeler was born in 1838. Having been converted at the age of seventeen, he became anxious to prepare for Christian work. At the age of nineteen, with only seventy-five cents in money, he arrived at Oberlin, hoping to work his way through College. While pursuing his studies there, he spent one vacation as missionary of the A. M. A. in Evansville, Ind., and one as missionary teacher in Canada, among the refugees who had escaped from slavery. In May, 1861, he responded to the first call for three years' men, and enlisted in a company made up of students. On Aug. 26, he, with a large number of his regiment, was captured and held ten months in Southern prisons. Upon being released, he was discharged as being unfit for duty, and went home to recruit his health. In 1864 he was married, and with his young wife, joined the band of heroic and self-sacrificing teachers who, under the American Missionary Association, went South to labor among the recently liberated slaves. He had the princely salary of twenty-two dollars per month, and government rations, for his own and his wife's services. Their first school was at Harper's Ferry, where they had as night scholars some of the men who joined John Brown in his ill-fated enterprise. During the night of July 4, the Confederates captured the place, and the young teachers escaped on foot in the darkness.

After this, they taught successively at several different points, until the fall of 1865, when Mr. Wheeler was sent to Berea, Ky. This was the place where Rev. J. G. Free and Rev. J. A. R. Rogers had so heroically preached an anti-slavery Gospel, and planted a flourishing academy sometime in the fifties. In 1859, these men and their families had been driven from their homes and the State. The closing of the war made it possible for these exiles to return, and the academy was reopened with Mr. Wheeler as one of the teachers. A charter for a college was obtained, and soon three colored children applied for admission. It was a very serious question to solve. If these colored children were received, it was likely that the white scholars would leave; besides, in the unsettled condition of the South, would the teachers and their families be safe? But with their Lord's words before them, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me," they could not falter. The storm which they expected soon burst upon them, and the opposition was fierce and long continued, but they were mercifully preserved.

THE FIRST BEREA SCHOOL.

In 1871, Mr. Wheeler went to another part of the State on business for the college, where he fell into the hands of outlaws, who after repeatedly shooting at him, dragged him from bed at dead of night, not giving him time to dress. For a long time they tried to extort from him a promise that he would abandon his work and leave the State. As he resolutely refused, they threw him across a log and laid upon him fifty-three stripes with hickory whips, and with his back all mangled and bleeding, they let him go. After ten years of missionary work in the South, Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler returned to the North, with impaired health. It was not long until they were sent as missionary teachers among the Indians, where they spent seven years. In 1887, Mr. Wheeler began work as Sunday School Missionary, under the American Sunday School Union. He regards these eight years as by far the most fruitful years of his life's work. He has organized 165 Sunday Schools in destitute communities, into which he gathered more than 6,000 scholars. He has addressed and aided 277 other schools, having 13,499 scholars. He has reorganized or improved these schools in 526 cases; has made 12,521 visits to families, holding religious conversation and prayer with them as opportunity offered; distributed 779 Bible and Testaments, and large quantities of religious reading; and has delivered 1396 sermons and addresses. He has the names of 571 persons who were publicly pledged to accept Christ as their Saviour, in meetings in which he has labored alone, or prominently with others. The organization of ten churches has followed where he planted schools, and fourteen Young People's Societies have resulted in connection with his work. He has also been the means of contributing toward the support of other missionaries, who have performed faithful service.

PRAYER IN A CRISIS.

IN a recently published report Mr. George Muller, who feeds, clothes and educates two thousand orphans in his homes, at Bristol, England, mentions the following among his reminiscences of answered prayer: When the third house was filled with orphans, all the money was gone. Then came days that I had been looking for, viz., days when God would be glorified by answers to prayers in time of need. This was not the case a few times, or a hundred times. Thousands of times the day commenced with nothing to carry through the day, or nothing in hand from meal to meal, but God invariably helped. My most wealthy friends never had a hint of our need, not one besides those actually engaged in the work, and who united with me in prayer. One day we had three prayer-meetings from meal to Changed Hearts and Lives.

Our Sunday School Missionary tells of some Pioneer Gospel Triumphs in the Southwest.

FEW years ago I organized a Sunday School in a very wicked village in a hall, there being neither church nor school-house, and I was jeered by a few giddy young men. But the school lived and prospered, though I had to foster as well as plant it. I have learned recently of a meeting there in which many persons were converted; a church has been organized and a house of worship erected. A wicked young man of a sceptical disposition, not deigning to enter the church, had enough curiosity to go one night and look from the outside through a window at the meeting. I do not know how often this was repeated, but eventually he came to one of the services and came into the house and sat well towards the rear. But the truths of the Gospel took hold of his heart, his rebellious opposition was given up, and when the invitation was given for inquirers to come forward, the proud rejector, as if moved by a divine impulse, promptly surrendered to the good Lord. That was several months ago. Since then his consistent life and active service have attested the thoroughness of the change. His father, soon after his son's conversion, followed him in a public confession of his faith in Christ and united with the church, which is a light shining in a dark place; and the Sunday School is an "evergreen."

Many years ago, before the town of Moberly, Mo., was in existence, the late Stephen Paxson, widely known as a veteran missionary of the American Sunday School Union, planted a Sunday School in a country district, a few miles from here, organizing in a rude box house near a little saw-mill. It was felicitously called Mount Hope. The little box house long ago ceased to contain the radiant school where so many have obtained that blessed "hope which is an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast." Mount Hope Sunday School years since found a home in Mount Hope Church, a neat and comfortable edifice having been erected in which the School the prayer-meeting, and faithful ministers have brought everlasting consolation to many people. Mount Hope has also been a training school of Christian workers, one of whom, the now venerable Cowan Jenkins, a farmer, has been a pillar, and his example and counsel have exerted an influence far beyond his neighborhood.

BEREA COLLEGE, AS IT IS TO-DAY.

meal for help, but I had to go home after the last prayer-meeting with nothing in hand for the breakfast next morning (and we paid cash on delivery for everything).

On reaching home, I expected to find something there, but there was nothing. The next morning I went down to the Orphan Houses early to see if anything had come in. When I arrived, my chief helper showed me three pounds ($14.50) he had just received, between 6 and 7 a. m. The receipt of this sum in a time of such need was recorded in the next report, and after the report had been published, the donor came and said, "On the morning I gave that money I was expecting an important letter at my counting house, and went down early in consequence; on my way it came to my mind, Should I not give something for the orphans to-day? but I decided to do so in the evening. Again the thought was pressed on my mind, Why cannot I do so now? still I went on, but after walking a mile further in the direction of my office, I could not go on, and turned back at once to the Orphan House where I paid the money."

Several years ago, a very faithful man, and an efficient Sunday School superintendent, opened his heart to me in reference to a matter that troubled him. He believed that God had called him to preach, but he was past middle life, unlearned, of limited means and had a family dependent upon him, and saw no prospect of filling the standard of education necessary to ordination. I knew him to be a man of excellent judgment, great diligence, fervent in spirit and well read in the holy Scriptures. I encouraged him to enter every door as the Lord might lead him, as a lay worker. He has done so, and has been wonderfully blessed, organizing or aiding country Sunday Schools in his county, and laboring in country churches, revival after revival occurring in his work in which scores, probably hundreds, have been converted, and his usefulness is constantly growing.

One of the fruitful duties of a missionary is to aid Christian workers, and to suggest improved methods of work.

have been suspended, though disturbances at different points are still reported. The Ottoman Government has evidently withheld its hand, awaiting the action of Russia which is to assist in the pacification of Armenia. How this is to be ultimately accomplished remains to be disclosed.

Meanwhile the work of relieving distress and destitution in Armenia, in connection with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund, progresses uninterruptedly, at all the stations of the American Board to which remittances have been sent. In the city of Van, where Dr. Grace Kimball and her associates are pluckily engaged in relieving the needs of the fifteen thousand refugees, the work has expanded beyond all expectation. Our colored illustration on the first page of this issue, (reproduced from a photograph forwarded by Miss Kimball), shows a crowd of refugees, in all sorts of dilapidated garments—many in sheer rags—assembled in front of the headquarters of the Relief work in Van, and waiting to be supplied with a ration of bread. After exhausting the available bakery facilities, Dr. Kimball wisely constructed a bakery for the work exclusively, and of sufficient magnitude to supply the greatly increased demands that she could foresee were inevitable. Thousands are now being cared for daily at Van; indeed, it is strictly within the truth to state that in Dr. Kimball's hands the gifts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S contributors have already been the means of saving a vast number of human lives. The same is true, in degree, of the work done at the other relief stations, and we are confident that when all the reports are received, it will be found that the efforts of our friends in behalf of Armenia have been greatly blessed. Four new relief stations have been opened during the week, making a total of fifteen now supplied by the Fund.

In a letter just received from Miss Kimball, (dated Jan. 7th), she writes to the proprietor of this journal:

Accompanying the letter is a summary of the Relief Work at Van, which shows the following results up to January 1st :

Number of employees of Industrial Bureau 431, topspinning over 75 families of about 4750 persons. Of these 4 are exporters, 7 master weavers, 735 spinners of cotton and wool, 115 weavers of cotton, 37 weavers of woolen goods, and the remainder, carpet weavers, cutlers, spindle-fillers, sizers, knitters and sewers of bedding. The manufactures are coarse cotton cloth, woolen goods, carpets, a kind of heavy pocket worn by the villagers, socks, ready-made clothing and bedding. The product from July to November was largely sold to the Sassoun Relief Commission, though small quantities were distributed here, chiefly among refugees. The supply is not nearly equal to the demand.

In the Baking Department free bread is given regularly to 415 families or about 2500 persons. About 1500 persons have received rations for from a week to a month, while waiting to return to their villages. The allowance per capita is 1-1.2 pounds a day. Free bread is being given to the extent of 3000 pounds a day.

A letter received by the National Armenian Relief Committee from a leading missionary of the American Board in Constantinople gives some interesting information regarding the relief work generally. He writes :

"The funds so far appropriated will probably maintain the work on the present scale through the month of January. A special industrial relief is now being

A special fund is carried on at Van, where there are more than fifteen thousand refugees. The funds mainly come from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York.

"In most of the places which are central to the work of distribution, a cent and a half or two cents per day will keep a man alive. In the whole region the food was carried off by the plunderers, but there would be no economy in carrying food into steamers carry the goods without charge. In the region of Harpoot and Arabkir the plunderers are selling off the goods stolen, at reduced rates, so at present all that is needed is to be had on the ground. The bedding used by the people in this country is mostly quilted. But it is probable that it would be economical to bring from abroad warm, colored woolen blankets in some quantity, of about the quality used for the army; contributions of underclothing also might be accepted.

The American missionaries stationed in the provinces of Trebizond, Erzerum, Bitlis, Van, Harpoot, Diarbekir, Sivas, Angora, Adana and Aleppo, are careful in making their statements, and their private letters and their more formal reports to the U. S. Legation here have been extensively used in forming the opinions here expressed. The Armenian Patriarchate at Constantinople has very numerous communications from the bishops and other clergy in all of the above-named provinces. I have been permitted to see the whole mass of these communications which though sometimes written under circumstances of excitement which favor hasty views, are on the whole of very considerable value, particularly when supported by independent testimony. A great number of natives of the provinces named are in Constantinople for business reasons, and have received letters from their families which are valuable as throwing side-lights of per-to this country, states that probably two hundred villages around Harpoot have been destroyed. "Palu is one of the most needy fields," says Dr. Thom, "and Van is next, on account of the destruction of the villages around there. There are several hundred villages around Van that have been destroyed."

Dr. Thom has been in the Mesopotamian field twenty-one years. He does not think that this trouble will spread to Syria. Left to themselves, he believes that the Turks would not stop until the whole Christian population was killed or proselytized. Russian occupation, while a present benefit, would be ultimately fatal to missionary work in Armenia. The American Board reaches the whole field, and its missionaries are at the present time the only medium through which the suffering can be relieved.

In a private letter from Mardin received by Dr. Thom these particulars of the outbreak in that region are given:

When the Kurds were expelled from Diarbekir and the gates closed against them, they turned their attention to the villages. These, one after another, were taken, plundered, and in many instances, burned—massacre being generally in proportion to the degree of resistance made by the villagers. A district about ninety miles long and fifty broad, east of Diarbekir, and up to the borders of Syert, in the vilayet of Bitlis, was swept by this hurricane of destruction, wherever Christian villages nestled among the billows of this rolling country. We are not at present in a position to estimate the number of killed and wounded in cities, towns and villages. The first timation that the wave of wanton wreckage was moving southward was given in the attack upon Tel-Ermin, Wednesday, November 6th.

This Armenian town of two hundred houses and sixty shops, five hours west of Mardin, was taken the following day, plundered and burned. The next day Gori, a Syrian village south of Mardin, and only two hours away, shared the same fate.

About the same time the village of Abrahamiyeh fell into the hands of the Koords, and only Monsiueyeh, twenty miles north of the city remained intact. This they tried to capture, but were driven back. On Saturday and Sunday, November 26th and 27th, serious attempts were made by the Koords to enter the city in the hope that they would be aided from within. In this they were disappointed and obliged to withdraw with severe loss. The Koords persistently asserted that a firman for the slaughter of the Christians had been given, but that the Christians of Marha had rebuffed the government sonal experience on the picture of devastation which is already too well known.

"We have reason to believe that over 40,000 may prove to be the number killed in the ten provinces. From the consensus of letters received, we have estimated that 400,000 persons will need aid in order to live through the winter. Of these some 40,000 or 50,000 have escaped to Russia, where we may hope that their co-religionists will take care of them. About 100,000 are being fed, with bread, by the Ottoman Government, but have been warned that the supply is not to be continued very long. This government aid is at the rate of about half a pound of bread per day, and in the secluded districts this is given only on condition either of professing Mohammedanism, or of signing receipts for a much larger ration, the officials pocketing the difference. An unknown number of women and children have been carried off by the Turks and Kurds, and for a time at least will be supported by their captors. Probably 150,000 are being given bread by relatives who have escaped without complete loss of food supply. These together with the friends who now feed them will all be reduced to starvation before the winter is past."

Rev. Dr. D. M. Thom, a missionary of the American Board, stationed at Mardin, Mesopotamia, and who is now on a visit conceal it and defend them. When the Kurds realized that the government and city garrisons were a unit for the common defense, they drew out and the tide of attack swept further east taking Nisibin, and some twenty Christian villages in its way. Already thousands of refugees are collected near Mardin, with a prospect for more to follow. In the Diarbekir plain, three hundred refugees from the Diarbekir plain are begging food and clothing. The entire Christian population remaining in Syert has been stripped of every thing. Large measures of relief will need to be instituted before winter is over, or thousands will die from exposure and hunger.

A memorial has been signed by the Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States and transmitted to President Cleveland, in which it is set forth that 350,000 fellow-Christians are in danger of starvation and massacre in Armenia, and that at least 50,000 have already been murdered. The memorialists appeal for national action looking to the instant suppression of the massacres, the succoring of the unhappy survivors, and an ample guarantee of the safe exercise and maintenance of the faith for the future. They hold that our nation should cease to recognize Turkey as a civilized power as long as its barbarous treatment of the Armenians continues.

During the week, remittances from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund have been cabled through the American Board to the following stations in Armenia:

Kaisarea, - $1,000 Ourfa, - $1,000
Hadjin, - 500 Marash, - 1,000
Additional remittances have also been sent to Diarbeker, $1000, and Sivas, $500 making a total of $5,000 cabled during the week.

Contributions during the past week are acknowledged on the next page.

Turkey from abroad. The people in the country districts live mainly on wheat cracked and hulled, on bread, and on milk products, like butter, cheese and dried curds. Meat is rarely indulged in, and in winter can be had only in some preserved or dried form. In many places the people are dying from exposure, owing to the lack of clothing and bedding, quite as much as from actual starvation. It is not worth while to bring in clothing from abroad. The kind of clothes to which the people are accustomed are altogether different from those used in Europe or America. Perhaps coarse warm woolen goods in the piece might be brought in if the freight is allowed at a reduced rate. Clothing from Constantinople has been sent on to the nearer points economically, because the

Told by a Hospital Nurse.

SHE sat in my room, with her quiet hands folded, her cap and apron laid aside, a nurse on a vacation. I had asked for some of her experiences, and this was one.

"Her baby died," she said, speaking of "a case," on the ninth day after its birth. She was heart-broken, and wanted to die, too, and little wonder, for she was that pitiable person, a deserted wife, and her man was a drunkard, anyhow. Still, she did love him, and she'd wanted on the child to win him back.

When the babe drew his last breath, a tgle gasping, fluttering sigh, Mary turned r face to the wall. She wanted to die.
For days afterward, it seemed as if she ould have her wish, and die. Her poor nds grew as thin as a bird's claws. I had tie the loose wedding-ring fast, or it ould have rolled off the tiny thread of a nger and slipped away. The doctor pervered in building her up, and the head urse would not give up hope, but it arcely seemed that we would be able to ill the poor girl through.

One Sunday afternoon, one of those ones came to sing to the patients. I hadn't ken much stock myself in the King's daughters, but I did like Miss Harriet Locum's Ten. They were girls from the p of society, like the lilies of the field, but neither toiled nor spun, and as for their dress, purple and fine linen was no-where in comparison. Tailor-made gowns, and embroidered handkerchiefs, and lace and feathers, and everything that money could buy! They used to come to the hos- pital on Sunday afternoons, all in their dainty, elegant attire, and I thought of queens and princesses. Not that I ever saw any real ones.

Then they were so pleasant-spoken, so nice, I got to loving that Ten, and watching for them, too.

I laid out in my own mind to tell them about Mary Nelson. I thought if any one could rouse her, Flossie Haberdon could. But God managed it better.

That Sunday morning, Maggie McMorson died, and left a baby, a poor little thing, which, seeing it would never have a decent man to call father, might better have died with its mother. Before we sent it to the Foundling Asylum, we thought we'd try an experiment. We washed and dressed and fed it out of a bottle, and put it in a crib, waiting for the visit of the Ten-

They were late that day, but when they arrived in Flossy with her hands full of flowers, and Miss Slocum just behind her, they filled the bare ward with fragrance and bloom. Apple-blossoms, violets, spring-beauties, you would have thought the woods and orchards were on their way to cheer up the sick people and make them

Florence went straight to poor, pale Mary Nelson, and laid a great flowering branch of pink apple-blossoms beside her on the bed. For the first time since the baby died, Mary smiled, a pitiful flicker of a smile, but it made her look more human.

"I like them," she said. "We had them in the old home."
"Where was it, Mary?" asked Flossie.
"On the old Bay Shore," she answered.
The house is there yet, and the orchard, but the folks are dead."

"You might go and live there," said Flossie.

"I? Oh! no." If she hadn't been so weak, the "no" would have been very earnest.

"But it's yes," said Flossie, "only you must get well. I know God took your baby home. The angels will nurse him for you, dear. And here is a baby whose mother has gone away. Perhaps she'll help the angels look after your little one in heaven. But you can take care of hers, I think, and we'll open the home on the old Bay Shore, and send you and the motherless little one, and perhaps several more, up there to get well and strong. And now we are going to sing to you."

We took the mite of a child and put it down on the bed beside Mary. She did not just love it at first, but she did not turn away, which was something gained.

The Ten sang:

Nearer my God to thee,
Nearer to thee;
Even though it be a cross
That raiseth me,
Still all my song shall be Nearer my God to thee,
Nearer to thee!

And Mary Nelson slipped her arm under the baby's little head, and the hungry look went out of her face, and they both, child and woman, went off to sleep.

The Ten never did things by halves. You see they had a lot of money in their treasury, money they'd given themselves, or made their friends give, or raised by fairs and candy-pulls and entertainments. They wanted to do something worth while with this money, so they found out where Mary Nelson's old home was, and they went off and looked at it, and had titles and everything searched up all right, and then they bought it out and out.

I went up there, six months after Mary Nelson and the little one had been established in their home. The child was doing finely, and Mary was mothering her. Did I say it was a little girl? Children were playing around on the grass, and a crippled girl was by the door, her crutches leaning against a chair and she knitting some flummery things, dillies they call them, for a lady at the big hotel, who'd given her an order. I said I'd step in and speak to Mary, and when I did, I tell you, I was struck of a heap.

For sitting there, with the golden-haired baby that belonged to nobody in this world, least-wise that nobody in this world would ever own, was a big, brown-bearded man. The baby as I said nestling close against his breast. He was telling her a funny story, and Mary in the buttery beyond was singing like a lark.

"Why, why! Who?" said I, all dumb-struck as it were.

The man rose to his feet and put down little Winifred, who toddled away to the other children. And Mary came from her work, wiping her wet hands on her apron, and smiling at me from the door, as she came with happy eyes.

"I'm Jack Nelson, ma'am," the man said.

"Yes, Miss Elwina," Mary chimed in, "this is Jack, my husband, come home to me, and he says I may keep Winifred, and I never was so grateful in my life, as now to have my husband home again."

To my mind, being a spinster, it seemed rather queer that she should have asked her ne'er-do-weel Jack to let her keep the baby. After he had abandoned her as he did in her trouble, he had lost his rights. But she didn't see it that way, and Jack had been converted, owing to the Salvation Army, and their following him up, and he gave up drinking.

The two of them are in the cottage on the Bay Shore yet, keeping house for the Ten's Fresh Airs in the summer, and supporting their own family as they ought to in the winter. Mary's grown strong and hearty; she has three of her own now; but she never neglects pretty little Winifred, whose good looks are amazing, and whose mother is with the angels, I trust. Anyway, I hope so, for she repented at last, and went to him who said of another such, "Her sins which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much; but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little."

Cuba's Struggle.

INDICATIONS are apparent in all the dispatches from Cuba that the supreme crisis of the revolution is at hand. Campos, the magnanimous, liberal commander has been recalled, and in his place Gen. Weyler, the stern soldier, whose harshness and severity are proverbial. He is to be supported with vigor and the home government promises to place at his disposal sufficient force to crush out the insurrection in short order. On the other side, the revolutionists have extended their field of operations. The revolution covers the island from Cape Maisi on the east to Cape Anillo on the west. The fortified towns, where there are Spanish garrisons, are held against the insurgents, but everywhere there is no Spanish force, the people gladly surrender the town and welcome the revolutionary army. The entire revolutionary army now numbers nearly fifty thousand men. Spain, however, will have about one hundred and twenty-five thousand in a few days with the reinforcements arriving. But large numbers of the men are shut up in garrison towns and are, therefore, unable to take the field. The men, too, have the disadvantage of not knowing the country and they are not so well equipped with cavalry, so that the disproportion in the two armies is not so great as the figures imply. The two divisions of the revolutionary army are separated, Maceo has not yet returned from the expedition to the extreme West. Gomez awaits him in the Province of Havana, and it is the Spanish policy to prevent a junction of the two forces. Governor Marin has ordered the troops under his command, pending Gen. Weyler's arrival, with this object in view. He believes that the war cannot be broken. News, however, may come any day of a bold dash by Maceo and his junction with Gomez. If the revolutionary commanders can unite their forces, they believe that a rising will occur in Havana and that their friends in the city only await the news of a large insurgent force being in the neighborhood, to make the attempt. Meanwhile the outlay is ruinous to Spain, and the insurgents, by their destruction of property, are cutting off revenue, in the belief that with national bankruptcy staring the Government in the face, it will listen to proposals for peace. The insurgents are still determined to accept nothing short of independence, but they are willing to assume the gigantic debt apportioned to Cuba, if Spain will abandon the island to them. It is hoped that the influence of Campos in Madrid may contribute to some settlement of the struggle. Our government has been urged to interfere diplomatically in the conflict, but hitherto has refused. It would be contrary to our principles to meddle with the dispute, but American Christians as they read of the misery and death and anarchy which prevail in the island, may well remember that they pray to Him at whose coming all things shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. Isa. 2:4.

1st in a Mine.
A miner employed in the Exeter mine at Johnston, Pa., had an unpleasant experience recently which came near costing him his life. He went to work as usual one morning, but did not return to his home in the evening. His friends were concerned about his safety and made inquiry for him.

but someone had heard him say that he was going to New York and it was supposed that he had gone. No search was therefore made for him. Four days afterward, the engineer found that something was wrong with the air-current and went to the foot of an old shaft to investigate. There he saw the man who had been missed four days before. He was completely dazed and was faint with hunger. He said that while making his way out of the mine after his day's work his lamp had been accidentally extinguished. In attempting to grope his way, he had become confused and in half an hour he was completely lost. He wandered around in the darkness for four nights and three days vainly trying to find the right path, or to reach the place where his fellow-miners were at work. His wanderings must have carried him all the time away from the

in a heap on her toilet-table. On her arrival at home, she found that all her jewelry had been stolen. The table had been cleared and in the place of the jewels was a sarcastic note from the thief saying that he had listened to her statement in the church and had decided that it would be kind to remove temptation from so good a woman. Thus the sincerity of the lady's renunciation is put to a test she could not have expected. She doubtless regrets now the publicity of the avowal, which led to her loss, and also that a thief should have derived the benefit of her renunciation, which might otherwise have served some good cause. But it will be for her now to show, by her cheerfulness under her loss, that she really meant what she said when she renounced her jewels. Christian people sometimes forget how hard it would be for them if the sacrifices they profess themselves ready to make were required at their hands. Yet as we are expressly warned in the Scriptures, God has no pleasure in pledges of consecration which we are not prepared to fulfill. God will surely require it of thee. Deut. 23: 21.

Licensed to Drink.

A curious restriction was introduced at a recent session of the Legislature of Iowa,

The State would lose a great deal more than two dollars by some men's drinking, as it would have to support them in prison for crimes committed under the influence of drink. And on the other hand, the two dollars to the man might be only the initial payment of a series which in the end would cost him all he had, even the loss of his soul. To such a man the bargain, like the price men pay for sinful pleasures, is ruinous, body and soul.
He that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul. (Prov. 8: 36.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Last Year Many Churches Secured, Free of all expense, generous supplies of the best hymn book—Gospel Hymns—1 to 6—Complete. Music Edition, the best Church Hymnal in the world, by putting forth a little effort to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD into new homes. One Sunday School, through its scholars, managed to earn enough of these hymn-books to meet the requirements of a large congregation. To any church, desirous of availing itself of this exceptionally favorable opportunity, we shall be glad to send full particulars. Evangelist E. W. Bliss has been holding union services at Warren, R. I. The Baptists and the Methodists joined in the movement.

London's Fifteen or Sixteen Local Unions of Christian Endeavor have been federated into a London Council of Christian Endeavor, with Rev. F. B. Meyer as President.

Dr. D. J. Paton has returned to Australia after six months spent on Aniwa and the other islands of the New Hebrides group. He has expressed satisfaction at the progress made, and cherishes sanguine hopes for the future.

General Booth the Head of the Salvation Army has arrived at Madras, on his Indian tour, and met with a cordial reception. A large audience assembled to hear him deliver a address on his Indian social scheme, which has been well received by the public, and has favorably commented upon by the Press. It is stated that Lord Wenlock, the Governor, has promised him Government co-operation in obtaining land and financial support.

Dr. Newman Hall's Many friends in this country will be glad to learn that although he is now eighty years old, his physical strength is so well maintained that he recently preached in a large number of towns in Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian Congregational, and other churches.

An Excellent Example to Employers is set by the Indiana Bicycle Company of Indianapolis, Ind. It has established a free medical service for its employees. A physician has an office and dispensary in the factory, and any of the one thousand hands is at liberty to consult him free of charge. The company has further displayed its interest in its work-people by providing hot soup and coffee in the lunch hour. Its friendly interest of this kind were more generally manifested, a kindlier feeling between capital and labor would be established.

In a Paper Read Recently at the Victoria Institute in London, by an able Orientalist, it was stated that the moral precepts which Buddhists claim were taken by Bible writers from Buddhist books, do not appear in the early copies of those works. He said that a careful comparison of the books had led him irresistibly to the conclusion that the precepts were taken from the Bible and incorporated in the Buddhist works.

The Independent reports that the Evangelical movement in St. Petersburg, begun many years ago by Lord Radstock, and successfully developed by Colonel Pashkoff, has again taken a fresh impetus forward, having won converts among several families of Russian aristocrats. Two or three ladies, prominent in Russian society, are holding drawing-room meetings on Sunday afternoons.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has been laboring at Geneva, N. Y. The Opera House in which the meetings were held was crowded from orchestra to gallery day after day. At one of the meetings the house was given up to the military companies and veterans and they gave Dr. Munhall, who fought all through the war an enthusiastic welcome as a comrade. His talk was full of reminiscences and of earnest entreaty to his hearers to enlist under the banner of the Cross.

In Response to Appeals from Armenia, a number of friends have forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund gifts of jewelry (rings, brooches, earrings, watches, etc.), while appreciating the generous purpose of the donors, we have, for the past twelve months, on all occasions declined to receive contributions of this character, as the amount to be realized from their sale in New York is entirely disproportionate to their real value. We would, therefore, esteem it a favor if those friends who have forwarded such articles would send us their names and addresses, with a brief description of the articles, in order that we may return them safely by express, we prepaying all charges.

point he sought. When he was found he was in a part of the mine seldom visited and far away from any ordinary prospect of help. But for the difficulty with the air-current he might have remained where he was until he perished of exhaustion. It is so with men who are wandering in spiritual darkness. They need to be sought and guided to safety as Christ came to rescue the whole human race.

A Thief in a Church.

A lady at Wellfleet, Neb., is mourning the loss of jewels valued at fifty thousand dollars, which she sustained through a statement made at a church. A dispatch to the Chicago Inter-Ocean says that there was a revival in progress in the Methodist Episcopal Church at Wellfleet, at which there was a quickening of spiritual life. Among the members who were aroused to seek a higher life was the wife of a banker. In giving her testimony on January 27 she announced that she had been led to see the inconsistency of Christians decking themselves with expensive jewelry. She admitted that she had a love for these precious ornaments and had been accustomed to wear them. But, she said, she had gained new light on these matters during the revival; and when she dressed to come to the service that evening, she discarded rings and chains and ornaments of all kinds and had left them behind her and was referred to the Senate Committee on the Suppression of Intemperance. The senator who proposed the new bill comes from a district strongly in favor of prohibition. He was, however, a party to the legislation which, two years ago, modified the State's prohibitory law. Under the new bill he has now introduced, the drinkers, not the drink-sellers, would have to take out a license. According to its provisions, a man who desired to drink intoxicating liquor must apply to the City Council of the city in which he lives, stating his desire. The Council is then empowered to issue a license to him on the payment of two dollars. The license is not to be transferable, and will be good for one year. On presenting it at any dramshop, the bartender may supply him with any liquor he chooses to order and pay for. The bill prohibits liquor-dealers from supplying any person who does not hold one of these licenses to drink, and fixes the penalty of violation at a fine of ten dollars and costs. The prospective drinker must make public application for his license after due notice given, and the Council is directed to reject the application, if any relative or friend of the applicant protests against a license being issued to him. Probably the Senator's object is to make drinking odious. He does not regard the provision in the light of a bargain. If he did, it would, in many cases, be a bad bargain for both the State and that individual.

Ashanti Housewives.

They are Neat and Industrious, but with Peculiar Fashions of their Own.

NOW that the West African kingdom of Ashanti has come under civilized dominion, a strong effort is to be made, at an early date, to make that country the scene of missionary labor. As has already been stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, previous attempts to establish missions there failed in consequence of the determined opposition of the half-savage rulers of the country and the influence of the witch-doctors or fetish priests. Several godly missionaries who ventured to penetrate the country were constantly in danger of losing their lives, and one, whose treatment by a former brutal king was exceedingly barbarous, was the cause of a punitive expedition being sent by England to Coomassie.

It should not be imagined, however, that the Ashantis, though cruel and warlike, are to be classed with some of the lowest tribes of African savages. As a people, they are not wholly destitute of commendable traits of character, not the least of which is their industry and skill in domestic matters. Indeed, in all that relates to the simpler arts that are found among the African peoples, they are probably more skilled than a majority of those nations that have not yet come under the beneficent influence of a Christian civilization. Our photographs on this page afford a glimpse of certain phases of native life in Ashanti. One of the illustrations shows their primitive method of weaving. The end of the web is fastened to the earth with pins, and the loom itself is kept suspended by means of stout poles cut from trees, and forming a sort of rude framework. The shuttle is thrown crosswise, and the hands woven by the loom are about the breadth of one's hand. The finished product is used largely in making ntama, a garment that is folded around the wearer like a shawl. In weaving, the great toe is made to play an important part, as the picture shows. The home-made cloth is neat and durable, and no household in the Ashanti country is regarded as properly equipped unless it has a sufficient supply of this cloth—the product of its own house-

Our other illustration shows a group of young Ashanti women in full native toilette. According to ancient custom, Saturday is chosen as the day for dressing the hair, and very elaborate and diverse are the styles adopted. Those given in the photograph furnish an idea of Ashanti feminine taste in this matter. These styles, grotesque in the main, are only a few of the many different ways in which the ladies in Ashanti dress their hair. Saturday, being a sort of gala day, is also the occasion of the greatest dress display of the week. On other days the hair is worn simply wrapped up in a handkerchief.

In a few years from now, the Ashantis will probably have forgotten many of their present semi-barbaric customs. They will be gathered into schools, missions and churches, and, as has been the case with many other native tribes, will gradually assimilate civilized ideas and customs. Although among the last to be enrolled among the children of light, Ashanti may yet have a future of blessing and usefulness.

Wasted Time.

Parents cannot too deeply impress upon the minds of their children the value of time, the preciousness of opportunity, and the sin of "idling" away golden moments. It is a sin for which grown-up folks in the main are responsible. Every now and then a conscience, among the men and women who live easy, thoughtless lives, is stirred, and someone looks up anxiously, holding up some one of the petty idlenesses in which such people spend their days and nights, and says, "Is this wrong? Is it wicked to do this?" And when they get the answer, "No, certainly not wicked," then they go back and give their whole lives up to doing their innocent little piece of uselessness again. The question is whether that thing is keeping other better things away from you; whether behind its little bulk the vast privilege of duty and dignity is hid from you; whether it stands between God and your soul. If it does, then cut it off and cast it from you.

A Young Chinese Wife.

Mrs. George S. Hays, the wife of a missionary in China, writes this little sketch of the daily life of a young Chinese wife: "I have seen many poor household drudges of wives, who work unceasingly from morning until night, half starved, thinly clad, terribly abused, who do not dare to claim to have minds of their own. But I have seen dull faces light up at the thought of a heaven possible for even such as they. These women never leave home; they do not have an opportunity to worship idols; they take part mechanically in the worship of ancestors; they have little love of life, and little fear of death. But the mental calibre of the majority of Chinese women is vastly superior to that of the class just mentioned. Full of silly superstitions, most unreasonable when angry, and with many false ideas of life, yet the Chinese woman has an influence in her home which can never be fully estimated. It is not every husband who beats his wife in China. Some wives beat their husbands. 'There must be an acknowledged head in each household,' was the frank confession of a Chinese woman.

"Accounts of wives and mothers who render efficient help in affairs of business, and of educated women who are always consulted on important matters by their husbands who hold high rank along a pleasant country road, with beautiful green meadows either side of us, shade trees and bushes growing along the old rail fences, I heard the most delightful sounds, and on coming opposite a small maple tree, found upwards of a hundred male bobolinks (so-called in the North, the rice-birds of the South), near a female bird on the tree, and each one singing in perfect time. When they had finished one song, they would all start at the same instant and sing another. I saw my carriage at least twenty minutes most spell-bound, listening to the entrancing strains mortal ears could not hear, and driving slowly a half mile further on, could see and hear them in the same position, apparently oblivious to surroundings. I have been accustomed to take country drives all my life, but I have never seen or heard of anyone else listening to an open-air bird concert until I wrote it in your paper. The sweet memory of that morning drive can never be effaced from my mind."

Children's Religion.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is pleased occasionally to hear from young readers. In our mail, a few days ago, was a letter from a young friend (Gertrude O. McClifty, Ind.), who has something to say to the very large circle of young people who read these columns weekly. Gerty tells us why children should be religious. "Because," she writes, "Jesus has bidden us come to him. You know he has said, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me.' We should never use oft-repeated words: 'She is too young to join the church and profess religion and to understand the step she is taking. The little child is now in nursery and school-room, and will, in only a few short years, be a business man or a woman of the world. All these responsibilities will fall upon their shoulders. Will not communion with our Lord, and daily help from him aid them in the discharge of their duties?"

"Some of us may never give a thought to God's goodness. Remember, many children have led their parents to Christ. The sincere faith of a child often touches the heart of a hardened sinner, who would not heed anything else.

"Every day, we are doing what we know Jesus would not do. We get angry at our playmates. Many of us cheat him out of half of our lives. We do not allow the Good Shepherd to claim us as his own, until we are older. We rob him of so much of our lives, when we should have been working for him all the time. We ought to come to him while yet children, so that we may grow up in the good Master's service. And how much more a good, sweet, Christ-like child loved by every one loves a child who does not get angry, and is always doing deeds of kindness and helping some one. This is the religious child, and every one respects and loves it. But we all know a bad-tempered child is shunned and no one wants to associate with it. A good child's influence will spread throughout a whole community and do unbounded good. Let us be more like Christ, trusting him, and all will be right. I pray God every child may become religious. Then ours will be a sublime, happy and peaceful nation, a paradise on earth.

Another Bird Concert.

Mrs. T. E. Thorp, Sandy Hill, N. Y., sends this beautiful incident, apropos of something that recently appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "Reading in your paper of the concert of birds, brought to my mind a scene somewhat similar in the early summer of 1875. While driving

What Faith Can Do.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor topic for the Week Beginning Feb. 23
Lebrews 11: 1-10; 12: 1, 2.

No limit is set in the Bible to the power of faith. Like electricity in the natural world, it is continually astonishing us by new results. "All things are possible," we are told, "to him that believeth." It would seem like madness for a man without a private fortune to undertake to feed, clothe, and educate a thousand children, yet George Miller, without a dollar of his own, took that burden on his shoulders and has carried on that work for fifty years. He believed and this great result has been possible to him. The power of faith over disease has been proved again and again. In spite of the exaggeration and misrepresentation which have been uttered, there are all authenticated instances, in our own time, of the paralytic sufferer from spinal complaint and other functional maladies being restored through faith alone. But if we rightly understood what is really wonderful—if we had the heavenly object and could see what was really momentous, we should perceive that there is no miracle so great as that which changes the spiritual nature. An instance in point occurred within a few weeks. A young man has been a great grief to his father, a wealthy and highly respected gentleman, living within a hundred miles of New York City. The son had a propensity, apparently incurable, for dark and crooked ways. All the money he could gain, went in vicious ways. When he needed more money and it was refused him, his father being aware that to give him money was to provide him with the means for vicious indulgence—he resorted to crime to obtain it. His father then had to pay to save the young man from State's Prison. During the past few years he has followed this way and in other ways his son's account paid a hundred thousand dollars. Neither entreaties nor threats failed to get his son to lead a sane life. The young man layed accidentally into the missionary Mission and there he was converted. The change in him is complete. He is a new being. He has cut loose from evil associates and evil ways and is leading a new life. Think of it as we will, the change is marvellous. Some mighty force must have been set in operation to have produced it. We ought to know what it is, that we may use it. There is no mystery, no occultism about it. It is faith, and if we were not blind and deaf and obtuse, we should neglect it as we do. It can do everything for us that we really need, because it is the hand that reaches out and takes hold of omnipotent strength. A man is often disappointed when he is told, in any prime spiritual emergency, that he can conquer his difficulty by faith. The power appears inadequate. But is it really so? We know so little about our own natures and about the spiritual realm around us, that we should hesitate to pronounce as to the adequacy of any force. Recent psychological discoveries prove that there are forces of great potency in existence, that we do not understand and as yet do not know perfectly how to use. We know that they exist because we see their effects, but the nature of the power is a mystery. Why then should we hesitate to use the faith which has a philosophic basis for its foundation. "Looking unto Jesus," relying hold on his strength, claiming of him the power he promised, no man, however weak he may be, need fall. Faith can do this for us and there is no greater service it could render to many a harassed, distressed being.

The Sorrowful Way.

A street in Jerusalem, along which Christ is said to have walked, bearing his cross, is still called "Via Dolorosa," or "Sorrowful Way."

DEAR Christ, because the "Way"
That thou didst tread on earth was "Sorrowful."

And they that seek it find oft marked with blood
Thy footprints, shall I say,
Give me a sunnier path, more flowers to cull,
And all the things that this world calleth good?

And turning from the sound
Of thy meek voice, whose pleading "Follow me!"
Seems not so sweet as others whispering
And which so soon is drowned in "Come!"
In earth's loud music—shall I say to thee
I chose this world, here finds my heart its home?

Nay, tender, patient Friend! [my hand
Though "Sorrowful" that "Way," take thou
And lead me in it. Though I cannot see,
Through blinding tears its end.

It matters not—I know 'tis to the Land [thee, Where longing hearts meet face to face with

'Twill often lead, I know
Away from earth, to many a lovely height
From which the world will seek to tempt me by

The many flowers that grow
Beside its pathway, and which to the sight
Are fair and gay, but, ah! too quickly die.

'And, as I journey on,
I know my feet must one day reach the Gates
Of some sad Garden of Gethsemane,
Where I must kneel alone

In darkness, as thou didst, and pray that fate
Will take away some "cup" she pours for me.

—ALICE PETTUS DILLAR.

"He Leadeth Me."

I DID not see thy hand, dear Lord,
Guiding my feet so weary;
I oft forgot thy precious word,
And so this life seemed dreary.
Help me, my Father, now to know,
That thou my way art leading;
That thou thy mercy still dost show,
Thy child with manna feeding.
"Thy will be done," I then can say,
My lips the while still smiling;
Bright faith shall chase the tears away,
Life's dreariness beguiling.
Thy life enthroned shall fill my heart,
My lips no more complaining;
Though from all earthly hope I part,
Be thy love still remaining.

Say So!*

IF you have a friend, or brother,
Who has helped you as no other,
Why can't you speak, and let him know?
Say so!

If Christ the Lord is such a friend,
Who joy into your heart doth send
And peace is like a river's flow,
Say so!

Do you believe the Lord is good,
And that he gives you daily food;
And feel his Holy Spirit glow?
Say so!

Tell others of the wondrous love
Of Jesus, that your heart doth move;
And thus, the "Way," one wanderer show;
Say so! C. A. F.

Christ's Second Coming.

Scripture Evidences that the Passages Relating to the Second Advent do not Refer to the Death of the Believer.

The reasons already urged for believing that we have no right to regard death as in any sense the coming of the Lord, we may add the following exposition. It is by Rev. David Brown, who, though a pronounced post-millennialist, clearly perceived that in all that is stated in the Scriptures about the Second Advent, reference is made to an actual personal appearance of Christ, and not to the death of the believer. He said:

"The coming of Christ to individuals at death—however warrantably we may speak so, and whatever profitable considerations it may suggest—is not fitted for taking that place in the view of the believer which Scripture assigns to the Second Advent." And very properly illustrates by the following passages:

"And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven, this same Jesus which is taken up, from you into heaven shall"—What? Take you home soon to himself, at death? Nay, but shall "so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts 1: 10, 11.)

"And," he adds, "how know we that by jostling this event (the Advent), out of its Scriptural place in the expectations of the Church, we are not, in a great degree, destroying its character and power as a practical principle? Can we not believe, though unable to trace it, that God's methods are ever best; and that as in nature, so perhaps in revelation, a modification by us of the divine arrangements, apparently slight, and attended even with some seeming advantages, may be followed by a total and unexpected change of results, the opposite of what is anticipated and desired? So we fear it to be here." We would that we had space to quote more, for we admire this frank confession—that death is not the coming of our Lord—from one who labors so hard for post-millennialism.

Again, the substitution of death for the coming of the Lord, practically degrades the grand doctrine of the resurrection, from its lofty prominence in Scripture, to almost an unnecessary appendage. But we believe in the preaching of Jesus and the resurrection, (Acts 4: 2; 17: 18), and we look forward, with joyous anticipation to the resurrection from the dead, as the time when Jesus shall give us the victory over death (1. Cor. 15: 54-55).

Oh! that Christians might realize "the grace that is to be brought unto" us (not at death but) "at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (1. Pet. 1: 13.)

Nowhere in the Saviour's teachings are we commanded to watch or prepare for death. But we are commanded to watch and prepare for Christ's coming.

Therefore, let us not be deceived by the thought that our great enemy, death, is the precious coming of Jesus.

Nothing can be more comforting to the Church, the bride of Christ (Eph. 5: 23-32), than this precious promise, which our absent Lord has left us, that he will come and receive us unto himself, and that we shall be with him, to behold his glory.

An International Worker.

James Liddell Phillips's Life of Service for Sunday Schools in America and India.

SOME of Christ's most faithful servants do their work so quietly and with such self-effacement that until they are called to their reward and successors have to be searched for to fill their vacant places. Church does not realize how much they have done. This is true of the devoted whose portrait appears on this page. In his country and in India, where he labored in the service of the English Sunday School Union, Dr. Phillips gave him-

reservedly and untiringly to the cause of Christ, yet few outside the circle of his immediate associates knew the true value of the service he was rendering. A few months ago, away in a remote province of India, the summons came to him to cease from his labors. He was a week of suffering away from his family and then the busy life entered the eternal rest. India was the land of his birth. His father was the Rev. Jeremiah Phillips, an American missionary, stationed at the time of his birth in the Hindoo city of Balasore, South Orissa. Scarcely had the child fully realized the joy of the new world in their household, when death robbed the missionary of his beloved wife and the infant of his mother. In the last hours she besought God to comfort her husband in his loneliness and sorrow and to make her boy a blessing to his life. Years afterward, the boy was told that prayer and it became his earnest desire to fulfill it. The dying mother's head rested on his unconscious head in the solemn ordination as she prayed for him, consecrating him to the work in which she was called away. Happily in India, a lady, like-minded, became his wife and the stepmother of the child. She gave him a mother's love and tenderly strove to rear him "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Until the age of twelve years he remained under the care of his parents in India, mixing freely with the natives, coming familiar with their language and customs. His intelligence and restless, energetic temperament were early noticed by his stepmother and it became her prayer that he should become a missionary. That he might be thoroughly equipped for the work she encouraged him to learn the English thoroughly and when he left India in 1852 to be educated in America, and gave him a Bible into his hand as a parting gift. It was an Oriya translation that she found she exacted a promise from him that he would read at least ten verses every day.

His first home in America was at Westchester, N. Y., and there he was prepared for college. He worked hard and steadily at an early age to pass the examination for his entrance to Bowdoin. At Bowdoin he lost his ambition for a missionary career, and determined to make his permanent home in the United States. To his studies he added medicine, that he might be able to profess to support him here. Before he won his medical diploma, the grace of God had touched his heart; he publicly avowed himself a Christian, and was soon humbly and prayerfully asking, "Lord, what will thou have me do?" There could be no question as to the sphere in which he could render most effective service. He could read the difficult Oriya written characters and speak the language like the natives. No missionary sent to that land could acquire even by years of labor so perfect a command of the tongue as he had attained in boyhood, and had maintained by fulfilling his promise to his stepmother. The course therefore was clear, but first he wanted to study the methods of religious work in the United States. An opening occurred in New York which he was glad to accept. During his college course Mrs. T. C. Upton, the wife of one of the professors, and the author of several religious works, had taken a deep interest in his welfare, and had imparted to him an earnest longing for consecrated holy living. Her influence was over him when he came to New York, and remained with him all through his life. In his new sphere he came in contact with active Sunday School workers, who introduced him to that department of labor, and his intense love of children made it a labor of love.

In 1864 the way was opened for his return to the land of his birth. He was twenty-four years old, equipped with a sound theological training, a diploma as doctor of medicine, and an intense desire for the conversion of the section of India in which his boyhood days had been spent. He reached his station at Mednapur on July 1, 1865, and on the very next day preached to a large gathering of the natives in their own tongue. He received a warm welcome from all classes, and renewed acquaintance with old friends from whom he had been separated for twelve years. During the next ten years his labors were incessant. He conceived the idea of converting the whole of India through Sunday Schools. The idea became a passion with him. He would go any distance to assist a brother missionary in organizing a school or to make an address at some distant station to the children. In 1875 his services were needed in this country. He saved his society the cost of his journey by accepting the appointment of surgeon to a ship. On his arrival he laid before the Christian public a project dear to his heart—that of establishing a Bible School for native preachers and when he returned to India he took with him the funds required to establish it. The next seven years were devoted to organizing and developing the work.

He was in America again in 1890 when a request was sent to him that appealed to every fibre of his nature. The English Sunday School Union had determined to make a systematic effort to establish Sunday Schools throughout India. The Union urged him to take entire charge of the work, knowing how earnestly he had striven single-handed for the same object. He cheerfully accepted the appointment and entered on the work with zealous energy. From that time until his death in the fall of last year he labored with untiring patience. He traveled over India from coast to coast and away up into the northern provinces. He had the satisfaction before his death of seeing India organized into Sunday School Unions containing over five thousand Sunday Schools, in which two hundred thousand children were gathered every week. He was at Mussoorie on an organizing expedition when he was suddenly prostrated with severe illness. It was at first thought that he might be saved as he was accustomed to the climate from his birth, but his constitution was worn out by his long travels and incessant labor. In a few days the end came and with a prayer for India on his lips he breathed his last.

Religion in Iceland.

The island has 72,000 inhabitants of the Lutheran faith. The Bible is diligently read, and although the children do not receive education in schools, but from parents and ministers, every Icelander can read and write. A recent traveller says that the Icelanders have a better average culture than any European people. There are 287 churches, of which twelve are of stone, 256 of wood, and twenty-nine of turf. In the inside they are extremely plain, with bare walls. Only fifty-one churches possess a harmonium. Church services are well attended, and the clergy are highly respected.

CHAPTER IV.

That Other Captain.

I AM very glad you found that help, cousin," said Janet. She had been sitting in a rocking-chair not far from "My Captain's" bed. She now rose, went toward the open fire, and there stood, facing the flames that were all reaching up into the chimney like arms of gold. Her hands were clasped behind her. "What became—of—that—other captain?" asked Janet.

"That other captain? My neighbor, the Southerner? Oh! I believe he was only a private. Ought to be a captain, and may be one yet. I think when he left the hospital, he enlisted on our side, and no one knows but what he may be a general yet. He deserves something better than the title 'that other captain.' John could see Janet's hands clasped behind her. They had been firmly clasped, but the moment she asked a second question, "My Captain" noticed how convulsively they were working.

"What was the—name—of—that other captain—I mean that Southerner?"

"Melrose, I think—yes, I am sure, Thomas W. Melrose."

The moment he said this he saw Janet's hands how excitedly they were working, as if they were going through a dumb-alphabet and sending a message to somebody.

"Singular!" thought My Captain. "Can't see a bit of Janet's face and don't hear Janet's voice, but there are Janet's hands—why, how they are going! Sort of talking away!"

The effect was singular, that graceful, immovable figure, the head with its folds of thick black hair, the shapely shoulders, but everything silent, dumb. There were those hands twitching and twisting away, though talking as it seemed to John. If they were working off a message, then it was in a very mysterious language. She did speak, at last, in the usual fashion. "And you say he had a kind of look—?"

"A look—well, I don't know just how to describe it—but a look from a place away off, a look full of light and—and—" How Janet's hands did twist and turn now! How excitedly they talked! Then they broke apart suddenly, violently, and Janet turned as if to come to her cousin. No, she moved toward the door opening out into the kitchen. "I will send Jed in." But we must call him by his right name. He does not like the way the people here have of calling him 'Jed.' That was all she said—with her voice at least. Those convulsively working hands, the now agitated face, said very much. "My Captain" saw Janet's face. Its expression had entirely changed since she had left her rocking-chair. It was so full of pain and sorrow, and thus disquieted, the face passed out of sight and into the kitchen.

"How blind!" said "My Captain" aloud. "Why didn't I see it before? That's Winthrop Melrose, sure, the Southerner to whom Janet was engaged! I thought of him as Thomas in the hospital, but there was that initial W, and I remember I saw 'Winthrop' one day on a handkerchief he was using. That's the very one Janet was engaged to! Yes, I am sure of it! I am sure of it! I don't know how it, before this morning. I—I—declare!"

When Jed Davis entered the sitting-room, he found "My Captain" sitting up in bed, and his face was almost as distorted as Janet's.

"You look stirred up. This won't do, Captain."

He lifted the patient gently, and then he

"You and Janet had a fallin' out? You both look stirred up."

"Say, Jed?" replied the Captain nervously. "You remember years ago a young Southerner that used to come here to this house—come to see Janet?"

My Captain looked up into Jed's brown eyes that darkened at once.

"Yes," growled Jed.

"Wasn't his name, or didn't people call him Winthrop Marshall Melrose, I mean?"

"Yes, Winthrop Melrose," said Jed sullenly. "He turned up?"

"I met him off at the war."

"Rebel, I s'pose."

"No, a Union-man. He was obliged to go into the Southern army, but I don't think he wanted to."

"Now, now,—are you a-goin' to be caught with that bait? Do you really believe that story?"

"Everything I saw went to show that his story was true."

"I dunno,—I dunno about them Southerners."

"Some very good people among them. If we had been educated to believe in secession and that slavery was right, we might have done no better."

"I am—glad, I am glad I wasn't educated in no such way," said Jed, rising up, swinging his long arms and strutting down the room. "Educated in no such way—no sir! True blue, every time!"

He halted. His arms that had been going like pendulums, now hung down motionless.

"Say!" he thundered. "Say! Look here! That rebel married, Cap'n?"

"Said one day he hadn't wife, chiek nor child."

"Say, Cap'n, now—now—do you think she cares for him, do you think she really does?"

"Who care?"

"She—Janet."

"I don't know, Jed. How should I know?"

Jed shook his head and then asked, "She speak of him this morning?"

"I—I did—kind of blundered into it."

"Well, I think the best thing you can do is to blunder out of it—say no more about it. You've got all riled up, all worked up. It puts everything all back. Now you—you just keep as still as you can."

"My Captain" obeyed. Jed, too, for some reason was very quiet also. He did everything expected of him. He smoothed the pillow, handed the water or medicine that might be needed, but was speechless. He looked glum and acted glum. When Janet entered the room again, looking very serene, she said to Jed, "How is the patient now? I was careless this morning and let him talk too much. I am very sorry, I made a mistake."

"Oh, no!" exclaimed her cousin.

"How is he?" said Jed, petulantly.

"Wall as common."

"How are you, to-day?" asked Janet, noticing Jed's manner.

"Wall enough!" grumbled Jed, refusing to even look at her.

"What is the matter with Jed?" asked John when alone with Janet.

"I don't know, John."

Perhaps she could have told him had she known the nature of the conversation between the Captain and his nurse while she was gone. There was nothing further said about Thomas Winthrop Melrose, but while Janet was absent from the sick-room, she was in her chamber. She took out of a drawer in her bureau a little box. At the bottom, under various keepsakes, was a picture. She took it up and looked at it, murmuring: "Does he look that way, I wonder." It was the same kind of face that my captain had described when he spoke of a noble countenance, of eyes that seemed to look at you from afar, of eyes brightened by flashes. It was not a common face. She sighed, and in a little while returned to her patient, deep down in her heart, saying, "It might have been!"

Ten years ago, Janet met at Washington a young Southerner. This same Thomas Winthrop Melrose! The name was the same as that of "the other captain." What if two different individuals had had a similar "Thomas" and a similar "Winthrop" in the procession of names! However, the Melrose of ten summers ago became Janet's most particular friend, and a betrothal was a feature of this friendship. For two years he was seen quite often in the old home. He was very popular with the villagers. The fishermen liked him because he laughed at danger and could sail a boat with the best of them. The old people liked him because he was so courteous, so abundant in the little attentions that old age enjoys, but too often must dispense with. The young people made him a hero because enthusiastic, generous and brave to a fault. But—one day—Janet's father almost broke her heart by saying that—on the whole, he thought it would be best for her to—to drop her acquaintance with Winthrop Melrose. He gave several reasons that harmonized with the old Morton pride of which quality Janet's father had an abundant share. Pride builds up some families and ruins others. The Morton's were proud of their blood which was supposed to run out of a far away and distinguished source, and this young Southerner, what family-station did he have? They were proud of the wealth that had been accumulated in their family, so that people said a stream of gold ran in the Morton come. Janet did not improve the opportunity. Her pride only saw an insincere lover flirting with Lavina Skeele, and pride so magnified this supposed insincerity that she could see nothing else and lived bitterly to regret her mistake. This day of the talk with "My Captain," it seemed as if that late storm, wrecking his vessel, was raging all through the past history of her life. Especially did it swell and heave, tear up and shatter, all along the line of her relationship with Winthrop Melrose. Things she supposed she had forgotten, now came to the surface, as if a tornado were under them, bringing them to the light once more, so that the dead past became a painful present.

Oh ! how much suffering there was under the quiet face his cousin saw hovering above his bed.

"What is she thinking of?" wondered the invalid. Janet Morton's character lacked the great, controlling element of personal religion. She needed a strong power within her, even as her cousin. She needed power over that old inherited pride which would rise up sometimes and interfere with duty. Something else she needed. Since her mother's death there had been a great emptiness in her life, a vast vacuum. It was like the rolling away of the ocean from its bed and leaving a great, unoccupied gulf. She needed a Presence to come into her soul and occupy the emptiness there. And it seemed so strange that he, cousin John Morton, once counted so deficient, should be virtually her spiritual teacher, to-day. Stranger, too, that in connection with all of John's experience in the hospital, that an old lover should now be associated. He had practically been dead to her for years. He was now alive. He seemed to be speaking through her cousin's lips. One accusation brought against Winthrop Melrose was infidelity.

"Can't have my daughter married to an infidel!" Janet's father had said, though he was not a Christian man himself. And now this same accused infidel was the confessed instrument in the great change wrought in the life of Janet's cousin! This same infidel through John Morton was instructing the daughter of an accused-

"It is like a dream, and yet so real!" murmured Janet the afternoon of that same day, looking off from a window upon the sea. "I wonder if I shall ever have that blessing my cousin has!"

As she gazed afar, she saw through a gray stratum of rain-cloud extending above the sea, the sunlight had broken, and, falling upon the sea, had left a footprint of silver there. It was so gloomy everywhere else. To Janet, that space of silver in the sea was symbolic. Her cousin's life had been in just that way touched with a light fallen from above.

"Will mine be?" she wondered. She watched that space of light on the shadowed sea, and in the cloud-framed window.

"It's still in his face," she thought when she returned to his bed. Yes, as he lay there in bed, his face was peaceful and sunny with a radiance that had come to him, not from him. Not from the sea, but the sky, does our abiding light come, not from man but God.

Consecration.

O LORD of mercy, up above,
We pray thee fill our hearts with Christian love.

Forgive our faults as we forgive;
To thee, oh, make us ever closer live.
Breathe in our hearts thy love divine,
And make us truly, absolutely thine.

And may the dew of thy pure love
Upon the seed descend, and Christ the blessed Dove.

Look down from heaven's radiant height,
And show to mortal man sweet Zion's light.
And may the Holy Spirit's power
Touch every unrelenting heart this hour.

And thus the heavenly power of grace
O'erpower all evil, sanctify the base,
Salvation be to all mankind,
And closer all to our dear Saviour bind
The hearts that yearn for greater love—
For that pure love that only is above.

Where Eden's Garden Lay.

Any Differing Opinions, but the Most General Belief Points to Armenia as the Cradle of the Race.

ATTEMPTS have been made to identify the Garden of Eden in almost every country of the globe, but the preponderance of opinion locates it in Armenia, not far from Mount Ararat. After a study of the ground itself and a careful consideration of the argument in favor of other localities I have become convinced that the Lake Van region of Armenia more nearly meets the descriptions found in the Bible than any other as yet forwarded by man.

As we understand the requirements of the situation described in the Bible, the location of the Garden of Eden must be at the source of four rivers of water, of which two shall be the Euphrates and the Tigris. So far as that is concerned I meet with only one difficulty. It is not the difficulty of finding enough rivers, but the difficulty of selecting those which most nearly fulfil Bible requirements. As a matter of fact, there are in this region no fewer than seven rivers which claim consideration as the streams which flowed out of Eden—the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Aras, the Kour, the Djorokh, the Kizil Irmak, and the western branch of the Euphrates. The upper course of the Euphrates is divided into two mighty branches at a great distance apart, each one of which might serve as the Phrath mentioned in the Bible. The Tigris takes its rise far from the western end of Lake Van, its source being only five miles from the eastern arm of the Euphrates. But as no one now questions the Euphrates and the Tigris as being identical with the Phrath and Hiddekel of the Bible, their claims need not be argued here.

There remain, therefore, only two rivers out of which we need to make specific inquiries. There is every reason to believe that the river Arras, which rises in Armenia between the two arms of the Euphrates and runs in an easterly direction for six hundred miles to the Caspian Sea, is the Gihon of the Bible, and, indeed, the Persians to this day call it the Jichoon-arras. For a considerable part of its length the Arras forms the boundary line between Persia and the Caucasus region of Asiatic Russia. So little doubt is felt concerning the identity of this river that I need not discuss its claims further.

As to the Pison there is more latitude of choice. It may have been the western arm of the Euphrates, it may have been the Kour, the Djorokh, or the Kizil Irmak. Assuming, for the sake of simplifying matters, that the two arms of the Euphrates counted only as one river, and supposing that the river which took its rise nearest to the source of the Tigris, Arras, and Euphrates was the fourth stream, then the place would fall on the Djorokh, which rises near the Euphrates and flows in a north-easterly direction into the Black Sea.

These four rivers rise in the same district, within a few miles of each other. The Tigris has its source within five miles of the eastern branch of the Euphrates; the Djorokh rises within five or six miles of the eastern branch, and the Arras, in its upper course, approaches within ten miles of the branch of the Euphrates. Here, then, the Bible conditions are filled to the satisfaction of everybody except the theoretical archaeologist who looks for the source of all things in India.

The claims of the Kizil Irmak are not to be set lightly aside. It has been identified as the ancient Halys, and by many persons it is believed to be one of the rivers of the Garden of Eden. But its source, though very near to the western arm of the Euphrates, is nevertheless one hundred and forty miles distant from the source of the Arras, and fully eighty miles from any of the feeders of the Tigris, so that its claims are hardly as tenable as those of the Djorokh.

Some writers on this subject place the Garden of Eden on the river Shat-el-Arab, which is formed by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates about eighty miles above the Persian Gulf, but they do not seem to be able to account for the Pison and Gihon, and the merely casual fact that water will not run up-hill. They have the Tigris and the Euphrates right enough, but the rest of their theory seems to be rather vague and intangible. In support of their view, these writers have an added theory that there may have been other streams and water-courses marking the ancient landscape that do not now appear, but they ignore the fact that in the highlands of Armenia there are to this day four rivers of water which meet exactly the requirements of the Bible definition.

The opinion which fixes Eden in Armenia we have placed first, because it is that which has obtained most general support, and seems nearest the truth. For if we may suppose that, while Cain moved to the East, the posterity of Seth remained in the neighborhood of the primeval seat of mankind, and that Noah's ark rested not very far from the place of his former abode, then Mount Ararat, in Armenia, becomes a connecting point between the ante-diluvian and post-diluvian worlds, and the names of the Phrath, Hiddekel, etc., would readily be given to rivers, which, after the great deluge, seemed to flow in channels somewhat corresponding to the Paradisiacal streams.

Another reason for locating the site of the Garden of Eden at the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates, instead of in the district where their united waters empty into the Persian Gulf, is that the Hebrew word "yatsa," which is used to describe the going forth of the river from Eden to water the Garden, is employed only in speaking of the course of the river downward from its source. Taking the meaning of this word as a guide, it is clear that the river rises in Eden, flows into the Garden, and from thence is divided into four branches.

Reducing the question to a matter of modern geography, it may be said, in a general way, that the site of the Garden is now covered by the Turkish provinces of Van, Bitlis, and Erzeroum, and that the centre of the Garden would be midway between the cities of Van and Erzeroum. Included in this district are the cities of Van, Bitlis, Moush, Erzincan, and Erzeroum. The scene of the Sassoun massacre is also within the limits of the district.

The caravan route from Persia to the Black Sea passes through the Garden of Eden from end to end, entering it at Baiazid and leaving it at Baiburt on the road to Trebizond.

The people live in houses that an American would hesitate to stable a horse in. The houses are built of mud, or of sun-dried bricks. Various sorts of domestic animals have free access to the living rooms of the houses, to say nothing of all the specimens of the insect world that are known to man. Other specimens, unclassified of man, may occasionally be met with.

The fields are watered by irrigation, the water being conveyed in ditches from the little streams that trickle down the mountains of eternal snow. People live in much the manner they did in the time of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. In agriculture, as in civilization, the land has stood still for four thousand years. Indeed, in civilization it has retrograded. From the ancient civilization of Bible times it has relapsed into barbarism.

Of such is the Garden which God planted eastward in Eden.

TO THE CRISIS FAMILY.

As there are many letters to write to inquiring friends in regard to my welfare, I will take this way to write to all at once. As many of you well know, my health has been rapidly failing for three years or more past. I have been growing weaker and weighing less, until from one hundred and forty-five pounds I have got down to one hundred and seventeen and one-half pounds. My trouble is the dreadful lung disease. The best medical service in Fairhaven and New Bedford has given me up. They cannot reach my complaint, as I knew full well myself. The terrible disease fastened itself upon me afresh some nine weeks ago, prostrating me on a bed of sickness, and I felt that my days were numbered. With wife and the little ones we talked it over amid our prayers and tears; and unless God's hand should intervene, we must part. We were ready and could say, Thy will, O Lord, be done. I rallied, however, from that, and with much trembling got to my pulpit again, but only to take cold, and then the terrible relapse. My suffering was intense, and I longed to go to sleep and awake in the glorious kingdom. I was so weak that my wife had to wash my hands and face, and bring me what little nourishment I took. I can never forget the kindness of my dear people, nor repay them, only the Lord can and will do that. They so kindly come in every day to see me and bring me something to tempt my poor appetite.

While in this condition, through prayer, I was divinely directed myself, a physician in the city of New York, whom I had never heard of before. I stated to him my case, and he wrote me back that he would give me relief and finally a permanent cure. I got the medicine at once, although at quite a cost for a poor Advent minister, and although I have been taking it only a few days I am now much better, and can walk up and down stairs with ease. His method is entirely new. He puts the medicine directly into the lungs, thus checking the disease at once. Please remember me in prayer, that I may grow stronger in body and spirit, and soon be able to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ.

Your brother in him,

Fairhaven, Mass. O. L. WATERS.

Rev. Mr. Waters reports his further progress as follows, January, 13: "Am still improving. Last night I slept without waking, which I have not done before for many months. I am in all respects a different man."

January 22: "I attended services in my church last Sunday, which is the first time since December 1. Can now walk out pleasant days. My lungs feel as though they had been washed out and the disease tubes cleaned off."

Note.—The physician referred to by the pastor is Dr. Robert Hunter, 117 West 45th st., New York, from whom all particulars of the treatment can be obtained.

HINDUS LOOKING CHRISTWARD.

Of late much has been spoken and written concerning the great revival of Hinduism that is now going on in India and some other parts of the Eastern world. It is not altogether true, however, as some have asserted, that the agitation betokens a new and lasting infusion of life and vigor in ancient Hinduism. It is true rather that the priests and professors of that religion, alarmed by the progress of Christianity and discerning in its rapid spread a menace of ultimate destruction for themselves and their superstitions and idolatries, have summoned all their available resources for a grand rally against the new religion, with the intention of crushing it or inflicting such a blow that it will not be able to recover its lost ground in a whole generation.

On this subject a writer, in The Church at Home and Abroad, says: "Competent observers of the trend of Hindu thought have no hesitancy in declaring that it is bearing in the same direction as the higher thought of the English-speaking world—toward Christ. His Divinity is now openly acknowledged by orthodox Hindu journals, one of which went recently to the extent of asserting that the Chaitanya and Jesus Christ had been the only two full incarnations, while even Krishna was to be considered but a partial incarnation. Many Bengali pundits are coming to see that in Christ, and Christ only, are all worthy ideals realized. The movement toward Christ may come slowly, but come it will: Every missionary is daily seeing evidences of it. 'A few years ago,' writes one, 'I made friends with a Paramhansa, one of those religious persons who go without clothes. This man was well read in Sanskrit, and he had studied the Christian Scriptures besides. He had written the lives of twelve Paramhansas in Sanskrit verse, including himself and Jesus Christ among the number. Daily men and women came to worship this man with flowers, fruits and other offerings, and they earned sanctity by eating his leavings. When he came to know that I was a Christian, he at once began behaving with me as if I was a being from some higher sphere, and he persisted in making me eat and drink first, and then, eating the leavings himself.'

"Confucianism, Taoism and Buddhism have each contributed a share toward the preparation of China for Christ. Confucianism has preserved and emphasized the great idea of a Supreme Ruler, and bears witness also to the truth of immortality in its inculcation of the duty of worshipping the spirits of the dead. Taoism, while it corrupted the idea of God, with its materialistic conceptions, popularized the idea of immortality. Confucianism, Taoism, and Buddhism have prepared a way for Christianity by their defects."

LOW RATES TO WASHINGTON, D. C.

Personally-Conducted Tours via Pennsylvania Railroad.

Apart from the fact that Washington is one of the most interesting cities in the world, it seems almost as if one were neglecting a principal duty of citizenship by failing to visit the "Nation's Capital." More apparent does this become when taking into consideration the fact that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company's personally-conducted tours leaving New York and Philadelphia February 6 and 27, March 19, and April 12, 1896, are now on sale.

A Cloud of Witnesses.

Most people are skeptical about the cure of Asthma, Catarrh, Bronchitis and similar diseases, and this advertisement is intended for any "doubting Thomas" who is a reasonable person. Are you open to conviction? We know from thousands of letters (hundreds from readers of this paper, in which we have advertised for months) that Hyomei, the new and wonderful Australian "Dry-Air" treatment, comprised in relieves 99 out of every 100 people who try it, and cures 99 out of every 100 who use it conscientiously and according to directions. Here are the endorsements of living men and women whom you must believe—you can't help yourself.

Booth's Pocket Inhaler Outfit, by mail, $1.00

Bronchitis.

Hon. FRANCIS H. WILSON, Member of Congress from Brooklyn, writes:

Temple Court, New York City, November 26, 1894.

My Dear Mr. Wyckoff: On your suggestion, I procured from your friend, Mr. Booth, one of his Pocket Inhalers. It has worked like a charm. The Bronchitis has entirely disappeared, and, thanks to you, is the first thing I have found in ten years that has given permanent relief. There is certainly a great field for a remedy having such merit.

Cordially yours, F. H. WILSON.

[The above is to the late W. O. Wyckoff, Esq., President Remington Typewriter Co.]

Colds.

Boston, Mass., July 30, 1895.

In my family of three we have used the Hyomei, and have been perfectly satisfied with the result. None of us have had a cold since we have had it. I believe it is a great preventive as well as a cure.

REV. STANLEY SEARING, 10 Carter Street.

Loss of Voice.

Brooklyn, N. Y., February 1, 1895.

Booth's Pocket Inhaler works like a charm. The first inhalation gave relief. It is a blessing to humanity, and I am sure it is not better known. I add my name to the "Pass-It-On-Society."

Sincerely yours,

Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs and microbes which cause diseases of the respiratory organs.

The air, thoroughly charged with Hyomei, is inhaled through the Pocket Inhaler at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air cells, is slowly exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It stops all spasmodic coughing instantly, clears the voice, expands the lungs, and increases the breathing capacity.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete, by Mail, $1.00, consisting of pocket inhaler made of deodorized hard rubber, beautifully polished; a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send me your address, and my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei does cure. Consultation and trial treatment free at my office.

Hyomei Balm.—An antiseptic skin food for weak chests, burns, scalds, chapped lips, rough hands, frost bites, eczema, etc. Nothing has been discovered so effective for the purposes named. Price by mail, 50 cents.

Asthma.

Deer Park Parsonage, Baltimore, Md., Oct. 7, 1895.

The Pocket Inhaler came Friday morning. Mrs. Honey had been suffering severely for three weeks daily with Asthma. As soon as the Inhaler came, she began using it, and after a few inhalations, the Asthma ceased, and now, Tuesday, it has not returned. She has had this trouble since she was seven years old, and is now forty. We have spent hundreds of dollars in search of relief, purchasing everything we saw advertised.

Rev. GEORGE H. HONEY.

Catarrhal Deafness.

Syracuse, N. Y., March 6, 1895.

Having been personally relieved from Catarrh through the use of an Inhaler charged with Hyomei, I take pleasure in recommending it most highly. Mr. H. H. Warner, of Rochester, of Warner's Safe Cure fame, according to his own statement, made in the presence of a friend of mine, Dr. Frank E. Howe, Barrett House, Broadway, New York, has been cured of Catarrh and Catarrhal Deafness of several years' standing through the use of Hyomei.

E. G. WYCKOFF, No. 209 Genesee Street.

Chronic Cough.

Manchester, Mass., March 26, 1895.

Inclosed find $1.00 for Pocket Inhaler outfit. The one I bought of you for my mother did her a world of good. She writes me that her cough is completely cured. Success to you.

ABNER J. GANNETT.

Catarrh.

Boston, Mass., April 20, 1894.

I had Catarrh for twenty years, and the last ten years (passed in this great establishment) I suffered fearfully. It extended to my throat; the base of my tongue was badly affected. I could not sleep with my mouth closed. I began using Hyomei in December, and in two weeks I was entirely—and now, after four months and no return of the disease, I can say permanently—cured. I am going to ask the head of this firm, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, to endorse this statement.

FLVIRA E. B. GIBSON.

Consumption.

Buffalo, N. Y., August 22, 1895.

In thirty years' experience in the practice of medicine, I have never given my name in support of a proprietary remedy; for I have never seen one that performed all and more than was claimed for it, until I met with Hyomei, which I endorse with all my heart (professional ethics to the contrary notwithstanding), for I believe it a duty I owe to humanity. Since testing Hyomei in Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, Hay Fever, and last, but far from being least, Galloping Consumption, in an advanced stage, which by the use of the Inhaler one hour a day, and the Pocket Inhaler ten minutes every hour, with no other medicine, in four weeks was transformed into an assured recovery; I believe in it for itself for what it has done, and I gladly add my name to the "Pass-It-On-Society."

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN

Discovered by Accident.—In Cosmetics, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterwards it was discovered that the hair completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. Its purpose is to remove all superfluous hair, and to do so in a simple and safe manner. It is not a depilatory, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and to scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CANNOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the hair growth such as the beard or hair on the neck may require two or more applications before all roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without all injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE REMOVES HAIR PERMANENTLY. Recommended by all who have tested its merits—used by people of refinement.—Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, the rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as a to-be-toothbrush. Young men who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy the growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (received from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with full address written plainly. Correspondence accepted privately. Postage stamps received same as cash. (Always mention your country and this paper.) THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

BRINGING IN THE SHEAVES.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Joel 3: 13, "Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe."

THE sword has been poetized and the world has celebrated the sword of Bolivar, the sword of Cortez, and the sword of Lafayette. The pen has been properly eulogized, and the world has celebrated the pen of Addison, the pen of Southey, and the pen of Irving. The painters' pencil has been honored, and the world has celebrated the pencil of Murillo, the pencil of Rubens, and the pencil of Bierstadt. The sculptor's chisel has come in for high encomium, and the world has celebrated Chantrey's chisel, and Crawford's chisel, and Greenough's chisel. But there is one instrument about which I sing the first canto that was ever sung—the Sickle, the sickle of the Bible, the sickle that has reaped the harvest of many centuries. Sharp, and bent into a semi-circle, and glittering, this reaping hook, no longer than your arm, has furnished the bread for thousands of years. Its success has produced the wealth of nations. It has had more to do with the world's progress than sword, and pen, and pencil, and chisel, all put together. Christ puts the sickle into exquisite sermonic simile, and you see that instrument flash all up and down the Apocalypse as St. John swings it, while through Joel in my text God commands the people, as through his servants now he commands them—"Put ye in the sickle for the harvest is ripe."

Last November there was great rejoicing all over the land. With trumpet and cornet and organ and thousand-voiced psalm we praised the Lord for the temporal harvests. We praised God for the wheat, the rye, the oats, the cotton, the rice, all the fruits of the orchard and all the grains of the field; and the nation never does a better thing than when in the autumn it gathers to festivity and thanks God for the greatness of the harvest. But I come to-day to speak to you of richer harvests, even the spiritual. How shall we estimate the value of a man? We say he is worth so many dollars, or he has achieved such and such a position; but we know very well there are some men at the top of the ladder who ought to be at the bottom, and some at the bottom who ought to be at the top, and the only way to estimate a man is by his soul. We all know that we shall live forever. Death cannot kill us. Other crafts may be drawn into the whirlpool or shivered on the rocks, but this life within us will weather all storms and drop no anchor, and ten million years after death will shake out signals on the high seas of eternity. You put the mendicant off your doorstep and say he is only a beggar; but he is worth all the gold of the mountains, worth all the pearls of the sea, worth the stars, worth the entire material universe. Take all the paper that ever came from the paper-mills and put it side by side and sheet by sheet, and let men with fleetest penmanship write upon it for a million years, and they will only have begun to write the value of the soul. Suppose I owned Colorado and Nevada and Australia, of how much value would they be to me one moment after I departed this life?

How much of Philadelphia does Stephen Girard own to-day? How much of Boston property does Abbott Lawrence own to-day? The man who to-day hath a dollar in his pocket hath more worldly estate than the millionaire who died last year. How do you suppose I feel, standing here surrounded by a multitude of souls, each one worth more than the material universe? Oh, was I not right in saying, this spiritual harvest is richer than the temporal harvest? I must tighten the girdle, I must sharpen the sickle, I must be careful how I swing the instrument for gathering the grain, lest one stalk be lost. One of the most powerful sickles for reaping this spiritual harvest is the preaching of the Gospel. If the sickle have a rose-wood handle, and it be adorned with precious stones, and yet it cannot bring down the grain, it is not much of a sickle, and preaching amounts to nothing unless it harvests souls for God. Shall we preach philosophy? The Ralph Waldo Emersons could beat us at that. Shall we preach science? The Agassizes could beat us at that. The minister of Jesus Christ with weakest arm going forth in earnest prayer, and wielding this sickle of the Gospel, shall find the harvest all around him waiting for the angel sheaf-binders. Oh, this harvest of souls! I notice in the fields that the farmer did not stand upright when he gathered the grain. I noticed he had to stoop to his work, and I noticed in order to bind the sheaves the better he had to put his knee upon them. And as we go forth in this work for God we cannot stand upright in our rhetoric and our metaphysics and our erudition. We have to stoop to our work. Ay, we have to put our knee to it or we will never gather sheaves for the Lord's garner. Peter swung that sickle on the day of Pentecost, and three thousand sheaves came in. Richard Baxter swung that sickle at Kidderminster, and McCheyne at Dundee, and vast multitudes came into the kingdom of our God.

Oh, this is a mighty Gospel! It captured not only John the lamb, but Paul the lion. Men may gnash their teeth at it, and clinch their fists, but it is the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation. But alas, if it is only preached in pulpits and on Sabbath days! We must go forth into our stores, our shops, our banking-houses, our factories, and the streets, and everywhere preach Christ. We stand in our pulpits for two hours on the Sabbath and commend Christ to the people; but there are 168 hours in the week, and what are the two hours on the Sabbath against the 166? Oh, there comes down the ordination of God this day upon all the people, men who toil with head and hand and foot, the ordination comes upon all merchants, upon all mechanics, upon all farmers, and God says to you as he says to me, "Go, teach all nations. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and that which he believeth not shall be damned." Mighty Gospel, let this whole earth hear it! The story of Christ is to regenerate the nations, it is to eradicate all wrong, it is to turn the earth into a paradise. An old artist painted the Lord's Supper, and he wanted the chief attention directed to the face of Christ. When he invited his friends in to criticise the picture, they admired the chalice more than they did the face, and the old artist said, "This picture is a failure," and he dashed out the picture of the cups, and said: "I shall have nothing to detract from the face of the Lord; Christ is the all of this picture."

Another powerful sickle for the reaping of this harvest is Christian song. I know in many churches the whole work is delegated to a few people standing in the organ-loft. But, my friends, as others cannot repent for us and others cannot die for us, we cannot delegate to others the work of singing for us. While a few drilled artists shall take the chants and execute the more skilful music, when the hymn is given out let there be hundreds and thousands of voices uniting in the acclamation. On the way to grandeurs that never cease and glories that never die, let us sing. At the battle of Lutzen, a general came to the king and said: "Those soldiers are singing as they are going into battle. Shall I stop them?" "No," said the king, "men that can sing like that can fight." Oh, the power of Christian song! When I argue here you may argue back. The argument you make against religion may be more skilful than the argument I make in behalf of religion. But who can stand before the pathos of some uplifted song like that which we sometimes sing:

Show pity, Lord, O Lord, forgive!
Let a repenting rebel live!
Are not thy mercies large and free?
May not a sinner trust in thee?

Another mighty sickle for the reaping of the Gospel harvest is prayer. What does God do with our prayers? Does he go on the battlements of heaven and throw them off? No. What do you do with gifts given you by those who love you very much? You keep them with great sacredness. And do you suppose God will take our prayers, offered in the sincerity and love of our hearts, and scatter them to the winds? Oh, no! He will answer them all in some way. Oh, what a mighty thing prayer is! It is not a long rigmarole of "ohs," and "ahs," and "for ever and ever, Amen." It is a breathing of the heart into the heart of God. Oh, what a mighty thing prayer is! Elijah with it reached up to the clouds and shook down the showers. With it John Knox shook Scotland. With it Martin Luther shook the earth. And when Philip Melancthon lay sick unto death, as many supposed, Martin Luther came in and said, "Philip, we can't spare you!" "Oh," said he, "Martin, you must let me go; I am tired of persecution and tired of life. I want to go to be with my God." "No," said Martin Luther, "you shall not go; you must take this food and then I will pray for you." "No, Martin," said Melancthon, "you must let me go." Martin Luther said: "You take this food, or I will excommunicate you." He took the food and Martin Luther knelt down and prayed as only he could pray, and convalescence came and Martin Luther went back and said to his friends: "God has saved the life of Philip Melancthon in direct answer to my prayer." Oh, the power of prayer! Have you tested it?

Dr. Prime, of New York, in his beautiful book entitled, "Around the World," described a mausoleum in India which it took 20,000 men twenty-two years to build—that and the buildings surrounding—and he says: "Standing in that mausoleum and uttering a word, it is echoed back from a height of 150 feet; not an ordinary echo, but a prolonged music, as though there were angels hovering in the air." And every word of earnest prayer we utter has an echo, not from the marble cupola of an earthly mausoleum, but from the heart of God and from the wings of angels as they hover, crying: "Behold, he prays!" Oh, test it? Mighty sickle for reaping this Gospel harvest, the sickle of prayer!

It does not make so much difference about the posture you take, whether you sit, stand or kneel, or lie on your face, or in your physical agonies lie on your back; it does not make any difference about the physical posture, as was shown in a hospital, when the chaplain said as he looked over the beds of the suffering: "It is all those wounded men here who would like to be prayed for lift the hand! See, lifted two hands; others lifted one hand; some with hands amputated could only lift the stump of the arm. One man, but his arms amputated, could give no sign except to say, 'Me! Me!'" Oh, it does not make any difference about the rhetoric of your prayers; it does not make any difference about the posture; it does not make any difference whether you can lift a hand or have no hand to lift. God is ready to hear you. Prayer is answered. God is waiting to respond.

"Lift up your eyes upon the fields, for they are white already to harvest!" How many have you reaped for God? Do you ask me how many I have reaped for God? I cannot say. Now can you say how many you have reaped? I hope there are some who have been brought into the kingdom of God, through your instrumentality. Have there not been? Not one? You, a man thirty-five, forty, fifty years of age and not one? I see souls coming to glory. Here is a Sunday School teacher bringing ten or fifteen souls. Here is a tract distributor bringing in forty or fifty souls. Here is a man you never heard of who has been very useful in bringing souls to God. He comes with one hundred or fifty souls. They are the sheaves of the harvest. How many have you brought? Not one—can it be? What will God say? What will the angels say? Better crouch down in some corner of heaven and never show yourself. Oh, that harvest is to be reaped now! And this instant! Why not be reaped by God this hour?

"Oh," says some man, "I have been going on the wrong road for thirty, forty or fifty years; I have gone through the whole catalogue of crime and must first of all myself fixed up." Ah, you will never get yourself fixed up until Christ takes you in charge. You get worse and worse until he comes to the rescue. "Not the righteous; sinners Jesus came to call." So, you see, I take the very worst case there is; there is a man here who feels he is all right in heart and life, I am not talking to him, for he is probably a hypocrite. I will talk to him some other time. But if there is a man who feels himself all wrong, to him I address myself. Though you be wounded in the hands and wounded in the feet and wounded in the head and wounded in the heart, and though the gangrene of eternal death be upon you, one drop of the oil of divine life will cure your soul. Though you be soaked in evil indulgences, though your feet have gone in unclean places, though you have companioned with the abandoned and the lost, one touch of divine grace will save your soul.

I do not say that you will not have struggles after that. Oh, no! But they will be a different kind of struggle. You go into that battle and all hell is against you and you are alone, and you fight and you fight, weaker and weaker, until at last you fall and the powers of darkness trample on your soul. But in the other case you go into the battle and you fight stronger and stronger, until the evil propensity is smothered down and you get the victory through the Lord Jesus Christ. Oh, come out of your sins! Have you not been bruised by sin long enough? Have you not cared that load long enough? Have you not fought that battle long enough?

I rattle the gates of your sepulchre to-day. I take the trumpet of the Gospel and blow the long, loud blast. Round went into battle. Charlemagne's army had been driven back by the three armies of the Saracens, and Roland, in almost despair, took up the trumpet and blew the blast in one of the mountain passes, and under the power of those three blasts the Saracens recoiled and fled in terror. But History says that when he had blown the third blast Roland's trumpet broke.

Take this trumpet of the Gospel and blow the first blast: "Whosoever will." Blow the second blast: "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found." I blow the third blast: "Now is the accepted time." But the trumpet does not break. It was handed down by our forefathers to us, and we will hand it down to our children, that after we are dead they may blow the trumpet, telling the world that we have a pardoning God, a loving God, a sympathetic God, and that more to him than the throne on which he sits is the joy of seeing a prodigal put his finger on the latch of his father's house.

I invite any one the most infidel, any one the most atheistic, I invite him into the kingdom of God with just as much heartiness as those who have for fifty years been under the teaching of the Gospel and believed it all. When I was living in Philadelphia a gentleman told me of a scene in which he was a participant. In a lowly street, in Philadelphia, there had been a powerful meeting going on for some time and many were converted, and among others one of the prominent members of the worst club-house in that city. The next night the leader of that club-house, the president of it, resolved that he would endeavor to get his comrade away. I came to the door, and before he entered I heard a Christian song, and under its power his soul was agitated. He went in and asked for prayer. Before he came out he was a subject of converting mercy. The next night another comrade went to reclaim the two who had been lost to their sinful circle. He went, and under the power of the Holy Ghost became a changed man, and the work went on until they were all saved and the infamous club-house disbanded. Oh, it is a mighty Gospel! Though you came here a child of sin you can go away a child of grace, you can go away singing:

Amazing grace, how sweet the sound
That saved a wretch like me;
I once was lost, but now am found—
Was blind, but now I see.

Oh, give up your sins! Most of your life is already gone. Your children are going on the same wrong road. Why do you not stop? "This day is salvation come to thy house." Why not this moment look up into the face of Christ and say:

Just as I am, without one plea
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that thou bid'st me come to thee,
O Lamb of God, I come, I come.

God is going to save you. You are going to be among the shining ones. After the toils of life are over, you are going up to the everlasting rest, you are going up to your loved ones, departed parents and parted children. "O, my God," says one man, "how can I come to thee? I am so far off. Who will help me, I am so weak?" It seems such a great undertaking. "Oh, my brother, it is a great undertaking! It is so great you cannot accomplish it, but Christ can do the work. He will correct your heart and he will correct your life." "Oh," you say, "I will stop profanity." That will not save you. "Oh," you say, "I will stop Sabbath-breaking." That will not save you. There is only one door into the kingdom of God, and that is faith; only one ship that sails for heaven, and that is faith. Faith is the first step, the second step, the hundredth step, the thousandth step, the last step. By faith we enter the kingdom. By faith we keep in. In faith we die. Heaven is the reward of faith. The earthquake shook down the Philippian dungeon. The jailer said: "What shall I do?" Some of you would say: "Better get out of the place before the walls crush you." What did the Apostle say? "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." "Ah," you say, "there's the rub." What faith? Suppose you were thirsty and I offered you this glass of water, and you believed I meant to give it to you, and you came up and took it. You exercise faith.

You believe I mean to keep my promise. Christ offers you the water of everlasting life. You take it. That is faith.

Enter into the kingdom of God. Enter now. The door of life is set wide open. I plead with you by the bloody sweat of Gethsemane and the death-groan of Golgotha, by cross and crown, by Pilate's court-room and Joseph's sepulchre, by harps and chains, by kingdoms of light and realms of darkness, by the trumpet of the archangel that shall wake the dead, and by the throne of the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb, that you attend now to the things of eternity. Oh, what a sad thing it will be if, having come so near heaven, we miss it! Oh, to have come within sight of the shining pinnacles of the city and not have entered! Oh, to have been so near we have seen the mighty throng enter, and we not joining them! Angels of God, fly this way! Good news for you, tell the story among the redeemed on high! If there be one there especially longing for our salvation, let that one know it now. We put down our sorrows. Glory be to God for such a hope, for such a pardon, for such a joy, for such a heaven, for such a Christ!

Buddha's Borrowed Light.

Dr. Petrie, the Eminent Orientalist, Traces the Source of the Buddhist Wisdom.

IN a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Dr. Flinders Petrie, the famous Oriental scholar and explorer, written from London January 14th, he encloses a report of an important meeting of the Victoria Institute, London. The subject of "The Derivation of the Ethics of Buddhism" was investigated and carefully discussed at the meeting, its consideration being introduced in a brief paper, the author of which called attention to the frequency with which moral precepts, often similar to those in Holy Writ, were quoted as from Buddhist writings, this being very often done by Theosophists and others who sought to minimize the value of the Christian Scriptures. The question thereupon arose: Were these precepts to be found in the earlier Buddhist writings, and, if not original, whence were they derived? A careful examination of the Buddhist writings, and of the Old Testament showed that every valuable moral precept inculcated by Buddha or his followers was freely taught by Moses and the prophets centuries before Buddha existed; and this was scarcely to be wondered at, considering the light which had been thrown of late on the extent to which nations in earlier days held communication with each other. The Ethics of Buddhism were very evidently derived from those nations with whom the inhabitants of India had commercial and other relations, including the Jewish; which was in its greatest prosperity 500 years before Buddha was said to have existed; and also later, when the Captivity took place, and there was a tendency towards the dispersal of that people.

Attention was drawn to the evidence given by Strabo and other ancient writers to the great commercial intercourse existing in the tenth century B. C. between India, Persia, Parthia, Media, and the countries south of the Euxine, as well as the ancient traffic by sea which recent research had shown to have existed, and had been referred to at a recent meeting of the Institute as carried on from India round Ceylon and up the Red Sea, the ships being mostly manned by those intrepid mariners, of the earliest historic times, the Phœnicians, who were the foremost explorers of their day.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

Fed and Warmed for a Cent.

The St. Andrews Coffee Stands, and the Good They do Among the New York Poor—Mrs. Lamadrid's Unique Charity.

POSSIBLY if one were to search over the whole world, with a view to inquiring into its organized charities, and of testing the comparative values of its philanthropies—high-sounding or humble—he would experience difficulty in finding a charity at once so unique, so small, and yet so far-reaching as that which is the subject of the colored illustration on our first page. In January, 1887, Mrs. J. M. Lamadrid, an English lady, founded the first St. Andrews One-Cent Coffee Stand in New York City. She had seen the misery and poverty of certain quarters of the metropolis, and her heart yearned within her to help, as far as lay in her power, in alleviating that wretchedness. While living in London she had seen the penny coffee stands that abound in the neighborhood of Covent Garden Market, in the Whitechapel district, and in the district of which Gray's Inn Road is the great thoroughfare, and had noted how they were appreciated by the poor of those districts. It was impressed upon her that such stands would be a great boon to the same class in the American city where she had made her home. Accordingly, she had simple stands constructed, and, after procuring the necessary permission, they were set up in certain locations on the East-side, where they would be most helpful to the particular class of patrons for whom they were intended.

From the outset, Mrs. Lamadrid resolved that one cent should be the maximum charge, for those who were able to pay at all. Having private means of her own, she went courageously forward with the work. An office and kitchen were opened at No. 281 East Broadway, New York, and suitably equipped. In this kitchen all the food designed for consumption at the stands was cooked and prepared, and thence conveyed in covered wagons to the stands. Soon friends became interested in the work, and the founder was able to increase the number of stands in New York and to extend them to Brooklyn. At the present time St. Andrews One Cent Coffee stands are located as follows: Greenwich Street, Old Slip, Pier 3, East River, Grand Street and Market Place, Jefferson Market, Elm Street (at the Tombs), Fulton and Sands Sts., Brooklyn. They are changed from time to time, as circumstances demand. It is not to be supposed that one can purchase a very sumptuous meal for a cent, but Mrs. Lamadrid's menu is certainly a surprising one at that figure. Here it is:

Half-pint of coffee, with milk and sugar and one slice of bread, 1c.; Beef Soup, with vegetable, and one slice of bread, 1c.; pork and beans, 1c.; fish cakes, 1c.; sandwiches, 1c., and on Fridays—fish chowder, 1c.

The stands are open daily from 5 a.m.

to 7 p.m., and on Sundays from 7 a.m. to 2 p.m. Their patrons in the main are the very poor, the waifs and the wanderers of the streets, who have no home and who find it a boon to get for a penny a meal that will sustain life for a time. Tickets for distribution are sold to many charitable people at one dollar per hundred and these are given away to such hungry applicants as they may encounter on the streets. All the victuals are of good quality, the coffee especially being excellent.

It sometimes happens that among the patrons one sees at the St. Andrews stands there may be some well-dressed gentleman, or an active business man who steps aside a moment to toss off a cup of fragrant Java, but the majority are of the working class or the very poor. Among these people, the St. Andrews stands are regarded as a most practical charity, conducted in a manner to render prompt and welcome service to many beneficiaries who would otherwise remain helpless. The stands are open all the year round, the expenses averaging about the same each month, except for the month of November, when a free Thanksgiving dinner is given, and then they are heavier. The meals supplied at the stands do not include all the good work that is done. Quantities of cooked and uncooked food are given gratuitously daily from the Kitchen, and aggregate a large amount in the course of the year. Meal tickets are also given away free, to deserving applicants. The total cost of conducting the charity is between $8,000 and $9,000 a year, only a little over one half of which is received from the sales of meals at the stands and from meal tickets, the difference being contributed by friends who are interested in the good work Mrs. Lamadrid is doing and who desire to help her in its extension. It is a picturesque yet most useful charity, which might advantageously be multiplied ten-fold. In the bitter winter season, when the idle poor feel the inclement blasts and cower in fireless homes, in many cases, with possibly only a few pennies left to feed a whole family, the one cent coffee stands are hailed as a life-saving blessing and the name of their founder is recalled with real gratitude.

Gospel Progress in Africa.

A writer in the Mission Journal gives these encouraging facts concerning the progress of the Gospel in Uganda, Africa: "The spirit of God seems to have been poured out not only upon the missionaries, but upon the native Christians in a wonderful manner, and 1,000 baptisms are reported within the past year. There are now two hundred buildings used for public worship, and in connection with eighty-five out-stations, there are one hundred and thirty evangelists engaged in Christian work. At the beginning of this year, there were not, probably, more than twenty country churches (or reading rooms or synagogues), there are now not less than two hundred, of which the ten largest would contain 4,500 persons; the average capacity of all would be, perhaps, 150. In these there now assemble every Sunday not less than 20,000 souls to hear the Gospel; on week days not less than 4,000 assemble."

Fruits of Martyrdom.

Some two years ago two Swedish missionaries were slain by a mob at Sung-pu, China. Their portraits were published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the time. A report now given in China's Millions shows that the blood of those martyrs was not shed in vain. It seems that a Chinese woman read of the faith and patience of those missionaries, and was so impressed by what she was told that she traveled to another city in order to ask the missionaries about the religion which could produce such fruits. "What is it?" she asked, "that makes you Jesus people so different from us? We call you 'foreign devils'; our people have martyred two of your teachers who only did good to our people, and you show no revenge and receive me as a friend." She was told that this was the teaching of Jesus, who died for us when we were enemies. This woman, who was termed "the Chinese Queen of Sheba," continued for two weeks with the missionaries to learn of their faith and doctrine, and then returned to her own city to tell her neighbors: "These Jesus people know how to love their enemies."

Jesus the Messiah.

Sunday School Lesson for March 1. Luke 9: 18-27. Golden Text, Luke 9: 35. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ALL through his sojourn on earth, our beloved Lord manifested his constant dependence upon his Father: "I can of mine own self do nothing." (John 5: 30.) All he did was done under the continual guidance and by the indwelling power of the Father through the Spirit. As man he was as dependent as we are, and thus we see it was not only his delight to be much in prayer, it was to him as it is to us. His burden was not only the lost souls around him on every hand, but even more, the condition of his own disciples. They had not understood the miracles of the loaves for "their hearts were hardened," and in consequence of this they did not recognize him when he had walked upon the waves to succor them in the storm (Mark 6: 51, 52). When he repeated the miracle of the loaves, the Pharisees sought of him a sign from heaven as though these miracles were not enough and the disciples so little understood him that when he warned them against the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod, the very disciples who had conveyed the multiplied bread and fishes to the multitude on the mountain twice over actually think their Lord is reproaching them because they have forgotten their bread supply (Mark 8: 11-21), after such a testimony to his providing power! What should he do with such a generation? How should he train such disciples?

Jesus carried all his burden to his Father. From him he learned when to speak, and when to be silent, and now, just when all looked so unpromising, was his Father's hour for an important question. He was alone praying; his disciples were with him and he asked them, saying, "Whom say the people that I am? They answering said, John the Baptist; but some say Elias; and others say that one of the old prophets is risen again." Oh, how few there were who could say with Philip, "We have found him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph!" (John 1: 45.) How few had eyes to see that Jesus answered to the description of the Messiah in the Scriptures which were their boast!

A personal question followed, "But whom say ye that I am?" Without a moment's hesitation, Peter answered, "The Christ of God," or (Matt. 16: 16), "Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God." How had Peter learned this secret? He had heard the devils or demons which came out of Mary at the command of Jesus, say, "Thou art Christ the Son of God." (Luke 4: 41), but so had others of the twelve, and yet they had not come to the same conclusion as Peter. Jesus explains it when he says, "Blessed art thou Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." (Matt. 16: 17.) "A man can receive nothing except it be Given Him From Heaven."

(John 3: 27.) From heaven by revelation Peter had learned that Jesus was the Christ, and he had the privilege of being the first of the twelve to whom Jesus had revealed his secret. The Peter's revelation of the Christ was very different from those of the Lord himself. The very word of commendation from his Master that he believed in the Messiah, was the reward of his faith. The Lord's revelation of the Christ was the reward of his faith. The Lord's revelation of the Christ was the reward of his faith.

indeed unprepared for the way in which Jesus took the declaration of his faith in him. Probably Peter imagined that now the Lord would declare himself; that he would do his miracles in the populous cities, instead of away in the wilderness or the less prominent cities of Galilee; that soon the elders and the chief priests would be brought to acknowledge him; and naturally his first adherents would stand high in the coming kingdom. But such anticipations were rudely crushed.

In the first place, the Lord "straitly charged them and commanded them to tell no man that thing." To the flesh such a command would seem the height of folly, and no doubt the disciples, and especially Peter, were inwardly vexed beyond anything which they were willing should appear. But when Jesus went on to say, "The Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be raised on the third day," the indignation of Peter knew no bounds; he could not accept this, "Be it far from thee, Lord; this shall not be unto thee." (Matt. 16: 22.) What, lose the countenance of the chief priests and elders? This will ruin all our hopes of thy kingdom, no Lord, this cannot be; we must have the priests and elders with us. How shall we otherwise get hold of the people? We need prestige; we need influence. "What is this thou sayest, thou shalt suffer and be slain? No, we will stand by thee too truly to let that happen." Poor Peter! he little expected the severe rebuke, "Get thee behind me, Satan; thou art an offence unto me; for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men." (Matt. 16: 23.)

Truly it was out of Peter's depth, and out of the depth of all who have not learned of the Lord, "I can of mine own self do nothing." The Son of Man was "God manifest in the flesh," he was the second Adam. God had dealt with the first Adam, and all he could say to fallen man was: "Thou shalt die." But here is a second Adam who is unfallen, who was tempted as was the first Adam, who "suffered being tempted," and whose object was to redeem man from the fall, and its terrible consequences of sin and death.

Must He Die?

Yes; the Son of Man must suffer, must be rejected, must be slain. There was no other way. Only through death could he destroy "him that hath the power of death, even the devil" (Heb. 2: 14). But Peter's ideas, and all human ideas of building up Christ's kingdom by human power, human eloquence, human wisdom, human policy or wealth must utterly vanish before the power and wisdom of a crucified and risen Saviour.

"And he said to them all, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me. For whosoever shall save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it." To deny himself is to die to himself, his importance, his advantage of all kinds, and willingly to count for nothing. Peter was not yet ready for this. O, few there are who really do learn this lesson! How few who really lead a life of self-ignoring in favor of Christ, yielding themselves for him to use, and to live his own life through them! Peter was ready for any amount of sacrifice; he had already left business and his domestic comforts, and was ready to go to prison and to death, but to be nobody, after he had left all to follow Christ, was too much for even the Lord to expect, and he asked, "What shall we have therefore?" Six days later the same Peter, with James and John, saw the Lord in his glory, transfigured before them, and Peter's conviction that Jesus was the Christ was strengthened, but, so far from denying himself, we find him joining in a contention which took place among the twelve, as to which of them would be the greatest. (Mark 9: 34.) Until he saw that all his devotion, broke down under the sneer of a servant-maid; he did not really learn to deny himself.

Do we understand, accept and live by this, our Lord's rule of life? Do we judge all we do by this standard? Do we in our eating and drinking deny ourselves and take up our cross and follow him? Do we in our dress deny ourselves? Do we in our house and establishment, in our traveling and in our manner of life deny ourselves, and take up our cross and follow Christ? If we do, let it only be the outcome of a deeper denial of ourselves, an emptying of ourselves more akin to our Lord. Was he despised? then it is our right to be despised, and if men honor us, let us deny ourselves and refuse to receive an honor which is not our due.

and foster, might become a source of danger, leading the disciples into mistakes and excesses. They had seen him heal the sick, raise the dead, give sight to the blind, still the winds and waves, and feed five thousand persons with a provision not large enough for a score. The disciples had not only seen these things, but had themselves worked miracles, by the power he had given them. They must, by this time, know that their Master was no ordinary man, but was a heaven-sent, heaven-endowed Being. We know what would be the next thought in the Jewish mind. The Jews had been looking for their Messiah. In their conceptions of him, he would be a king mightier than David, more magnificent than Solomon. He would deliver the nation from its bondage to Rome, and would make it the greatest nation on earth. What more natural than for these twelve men, who had witnessed such manifestations of power, to say, this is the Messiah who was to come? In imagination, they already saw him seated on the throne of David, and themselves chief in authority under him. They must be undeceived. How would they bear it? Jesus was indeed the Messiah, but his elevation would be to the cross, not to the earthly throne. By his power he might have redeemed the nation; but by his suffering he would redeem the world.

With consummate tact, Jesus makes the disclosure. He elicits from the disciples a declaration of their faith. He had not overestimated it. Peter, as the spokesman of them all, unhesitatingly declares, "Thou art the Christ." Then gently and tenderly, Jesus tells them that it is not splendor and power, but suffering and death that lie before him. Not only so, but those who would follow him must take the same path. They must have been amazed as they listened, so much so that they did not comprehend, and not until after the events Christ predicted had occurred, did they realize that he meant what he said. Nor have succeeding generations perceived the meaning of the latter part of his declaration. The way of the Cross has been a mystery, and is so still. People still wonder when the Christian does not prosper in his business, when he seems to have more misfortunes than other men. They see the cross laid upon him; they see him staggering under heavy burdens of affliction in various forms; they see him harassed and perplexed and thwarted, and are surprised that God has not given so good a man, prosperity. Such a condition puzzled Job's friends. A greater mystery is occasionally seen, and will become increasingly common. It will be that of men not waiting to have the cross laid upon them, but voluntarily renouncing the good things of life, the prizes of the world, that they might have, and choosing the path of burden-bearing, life of service, of helpfulness, and esteem; such lives nobler than those devoted to money-getting and ambitious scheming. In every home such lives may be begun. The child who can bear fault-finding, who does not resent unjust treatment, who is ready to render cheerful service to parents, or brother, or sister who will willingly put down a fascinating book to perform some unpleasant duty who will stay away from fun and pleasure to wait on a sick sister, or will undertake a disagreeable errand and do all this not a merit, or with the manner of a martyr, but naturally and joyously, is taking the cross and following Christ. As Jesus said, such a child loses its life—all the things that most people call life. But what a blessing such a child would be at home! When he grows up, what a blessing he would be to his town! Such men and women are toiling to-day in the slums of our great cities, or in China, or Africa in squalor and hardship, when they might have ease and luxury with less of labor and effort, if they worked for their own benefit. The two ways are open to all. Those who want to enjoy life, to have riches and worldly advancement can follow their wish, if they push and struggle and grasp and hold fast and are contented and self-assertive. He also who wants eternal life can have it and this is the way: "Let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me. For whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall save it."

Take up his cross. In that wonderful little book, "The Sermon in the Hospital" the preacher speaking of the vine as a type of the Christian life, says:

Its way is not of pleasure nor of ease.
It groweth not like the wild trailing weeds
Whither it willets, flowering here and there,
Or running into lovely labyrinth
Of many forms and many fantasies,
Rejoicing in its own luxurious life,
And as it grows it is not free to heaven
But tied to a stake, and its arms stretch out
It is but crosswise, also forced and bound.
But so they leave it not; the husbandman
Comes early, with the pruning-hooks and shears
And strips it bare of all its innocent pride,
And wand'ring garlands, and cuts deep and sore,
Unsparring for its tenderness and joy.
And in its loss and pain it wasteth not;
But yields itself with unabated life,
More perfect under the despoiling hand.
The bleeding limbs are hardened into wood,
The lanced-out branches ripen into fruit
More full and precious, to the purple prime.

Till they see the kingdom of God. See who stood there saw the glorious sight of the transfigured Christ, shortly afterwards on the mount, and at the day of Pentecost they saw great crowds pressing into the kingdom. In Victor Hugo's famous story, the hero suffers desertion of friends, loss of his own good name, pain and persecution and misery of every kind; but at the last, the light comes. He does not know until he has seen the fruit of his patient suffering in the appreciation and love of those who have witnessed his struggles; his name is vindicated and he knows that many will mourn when he dies. The man who suffers for Christ's sake have the joy of knowing that their reward is sure. They see the kingdom before they taste of death.

Let him deny himself. No gift is so precious as one that costs the giver some personal sacrifice. Brown is sick and his friends, Smith and Jones wish to do him a service. Smith sends out a servant to get some fine hot-house grapes and take them to Brown's house. Jones makes inquiry and learns that his sick friend cannot sit up at night or day. Jones has a favorite chair in which he sits every night, a perfect nest of comfort. This arm-chair sends to Brown and contents himself with the ordinary wooden chair, that the man may have the comfort of an easy seat for his aching limbs. Which of the two showed most regard for the invalid?

INDIA FOR SIVA OR CHRIST?

A real Battle Impending between the Two Faiths—Hindus Rallying All the Forces of Heathenism—Christianity Facing a Crisis—Should the Missionary Forces be Reduced?

It is now known to the whole world that a great revival of the ancient native religion is now going on in India, and that this has been stirred up by priests and professors for the express purpose of resisting the advances of the comparatively new religion of Christ. Missionary work in India has for a number of years been intensely active, and the Gospels have made converts in large numbers. So general and widespread has been the diffusion of Christian principles that the Hindus have themselves begun to acknowledge that at last the seemingly impossible has happened, and that Siva's ancient glory is paling in the light of the Star of Bethlehem.

A very large proportion of the Christian work of our missionaries in heathen India is conducted by the American Board. It may be of timely interest to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—who are at present engaged in a great work of charity in Armenia, where the Relief Fund is now being distributed by the American Board missionaries—to learn of the mighty contest that is now waging between the two religions in India.

The progress which has been made, by God's blessing, since the first mission of the American Board was founded, in 1811, has astonished even the missionaries themselves. The missionaries of the American Board, who number 572, are laboring in twenty mission fields. They are occupying 102 stations. They have a native force of over 3,000 trained native workers, and are occupying over 1,000 outstations. There are now more than 44,000 native Christian members in their churches, with over 100,000 adherents. The missionaries and their devoted native helpers are eager to go forward and to enter the doors of opportunity that are everywhere opening before them.

The priests and leaders of the heathen religions in the meantime, seeing the progress which has been made by Christianity, and rightly judging that if this rate of progress were to continue, the old system upon which their prestige and their temple revenues depend, would in time be doomed to extinction, are now arming themselves to combat Christianity with an activity such as they have never before displayed. They are forming societies among themselves for the express purpose. They are publishing newspapers hostile to Christianity. They are translating and scattering broadcast, in leaflet form, the writings of Payne, Bradlaugh, Ingersoll, and others. They are even establishing Young Men's Hindu Associations on the line of our Y. M. C. A. and Christian Endeavor Societies. They are sending out preachers whose chief object is to ridicule Christianity and speak against Christian missions. They are starting numerous opposition schools to draw away children from the mission schools. The opposing forces of Christianity and heathenism are now face to face; the battle is between truth and error, light and darkness; between Christianity and the odious, debasing, idolatrous faith.

What message are the Christians at home now going to send to their generals and soldiers at the front? Will they say, "Go forward; seize every point of vantage; the Christians of America will stand behind you. Men and money in abundance will be forthcoming. Go on and win the 100,000,000 in your fields for Christ?" Is this the message which they desire sent? Or will they say, "Hold on; retrench, retreat; the Christians at home are too poor to even carry on the work which they have already begun." It is this latter message which in their name has already been sent by the Prudential Committee of the American Board to the missionaries at the front.

Owing chiefly to the fact that the American Board has not received many large legacies during the past few years, and that the two principal legacies on which they have been drawing are nearly exhausted, they are face to face with a serious financial problem. The American Board has each year for the past three years been obliged to enforce very considerable reductions on the estimates for the work sent home by the missionaries. The missionaries have thus cut down, and cut down in every direction, as far as they could—in not a few instances to the real harm of the work. But this year they are faced with the appalling fact that the American Board is necessitated, on account of lack of funds, to order a reduction of ten per cent. on the salaries of every one of its married missionaries, and more than thirty-three per cent. on all the native work under its care; and this reduction takes effect in every field, with the exception of Asiatic Turkey.

The Prudential Committee could not do otherwise. They were ordered by the Board not to incur any additional debt this year, but to cut the expenses right down to receipts. To do this, reduction had to be ordered. If it takes effect what will happen? In Ceylon, for example, where its missionaries are laboring, many of the village Mission Schools would have to be closed and some thousands of children turned out, who would eagerly be welcomed into the Hindu opposition schools now scattered throughout the

The hearts of all Christian workers and of all members of the Christian community would be appalled, pained, and disheartened, and the hearts of the enemies of Christianity would be elated and jubilant. Hinduism would receive in this way such an impetus as it has never had before. The faith of the whole community in the stability, permanency, and final success of Christianity and of Christian mission work would receive a staggering blow, and the mission work in Ceylon would be put back at least ten years.

What would take place in Ceylon would on the work which it has begun? Or will they tell the truth, and say that professing Christians at home love their luxuries more than they love their Lord?

This reduction would mean something to the 572 missionaries who are cheerfully giving up their lives to this work. It would break the hearts of some of them. The missionaries as a rule are brave men and women. See, for example, how the missionaries in Turkey have stood at their take place in everyone of the other twelve missions of the Board in which this reduction is ordered. The heathens and Mohammedans would say, "Christianity has begun to die out in America; the preaching of the Hindu and Mohammedan reformers who went to America has begun to tell. The Christians of America are reducing their work by a third this year; next year they will reduce another third, and the third year the missionaries and their work posts. They have given an object-lesson to the whole world of self-forgetting heroism, devotion to duty, and faith in God. Mrs. Montgomery, who has been a missionary in Turkey for many years, writing from Adana, where she is staying by her boarding school of girls to protect them from outrage, by her presence, wrote: "I count it the crowning glory of my life to be permitted to be here at this time." Dr. Barnum, of Harpoot, describing the events of the massacre there, and telling of the time when their houses were in flames, when their native people were being slaughtered before their eyes, and they themselves were being fired at, wrote: "We looked death in the face, and it seemed sweet to us."

The Christians of America can avert the danger that threatens our missionaries in India if they will. It is better to save from destruction than to permit destruction and then attempt to restore. One hundred dollars would support for a year four native village school teachers. Each teacher would have on the average fifty pupils in a school. Thus, $100 would prevent the giving up of four schools, and would result in keeping 200 children in a Christian school and under Christian instruction for a whole year. Twenty-five dollars would in the same way keep fifty children in school; $10 would keep twenty; $5 would keep ten; and $1 would keep two children in school for a year.

The photographs on this page have been furnished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through the kindness of Misses Mary and Margaret Leitch, missionaries of the American Board, which is the oldest and one of the most responsible missionary societies in the United States. The Christians of America, who, through this channel are seeking to send the Gospel to those in unevangelized lands, have undertaken the gigantic task of making known the love of Christ to 100,000,000 of heathen and Mohammedans, for the districts occupied by the American Board's missionaries, and in God's providence, through the comity of missions assigned to them for their work, and for which they as a mission are responsible, number 100,000,000 souls.

country, where they would be taught the Hindu book, obliged to put on daily the marks of the Hindu gods, and taught to ridicule and make a mock of the birth, life, and death on the cross of Jesus Christ. Young men from the higher educational mission schools would be turned out—men who are being trained for the teachers, colporteurs, pastors, and evangelists of the future. The printing and circulation of Christian literature would have to be curtailed. Some of the trained catechists and evangelists would have to be dismissed, and their work abandoned, and that through no fault of their own.

will be cleared out, and Christianity will have proved a failure." And thus the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that name which is above every name, and which ought to be dearer to us than life itself, would be ridiculed and laughed at by millions of people.

The Hindu and Mohammedan preachers would proclaim the news of this failure far and wide. The Hindu and Mohammedan papers would be full of it. It would be the one great subject of conversation in all the villages. How could the missionaries face it? Will they say that the Church of Christ is too poor to carry

SPEEDING HELP TO ARMENIA.

The Contributors to our Relief Fund now Doing a Noble Work at Fifteen Stations—Churches, Leagues and Sunday Schools Aiding the Christ-like Work of Charity.

As the true facts concerning the condition of the persecuted Armenians, published in these columns from week to week, penetrate the remotest corners of every State of our free and enlightened Union, the tide of sympathy and practical aid increases in strength and volume. Every mail brings us many letters of inquiry regarding the ancient Christian nation beyond the seas and almost all contain offers of help. Many of these come from churches, Sunday Schools and Christian Endeavor Societies, whose pastors, superintendents and leaders desire to lay before their friends the facts concerning the present suffering in the Armenian provinces. For the convenience of all who desire such information, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has prepared and will forward on application, to any address, a compact history of the Armenian persecution and the destitution that has overtaken this martyr nation, as the result of the Mohammedan effort to exterminate Christianity in ancient Eden, and to set up the Crescent in the land that was the first to accept the Cross. This pamphlet will afford all the information essential to a full understanding of the situation as it exists to-day.

In a letter just received from a merchant of Cesarea, dated Jan. 1 (delayed in consequence of the disturbances in Asia Minor), it is shown how thoroughly the Kurds and Turks performed their inhuman work of butchery and plunder in that section, the former taking the booty as their pay, according to the permission granted from Constantinople. The writer says:

In the district between Gemerek and Cesarea twenty-seven Armenian villages have been pillaged and burned. The thirteen villages this side of Gemerek, and five or six hours distant, such as Burhan, Dendil, Tekmen, etc., were also pillaged and ruined. Burhan was ravaged five times and Tekmen seven times. The raiders carried plunder from Dendil for three days continuously; they carried away even the old mats and wooden spoons from the houses. No clothing, no bedding, no utensils, and no food was left to the survivors in those villages. The people have been living on herbs gathered from the hill-sides, and cooked in the petroleum tins which the raiders had brought along full of petroleum to fire the houses with. In the district of Tounouz the Armenian villages, especially Hantavos, Kazmakara and Patatu were pillaged and destroyed, the male inhabitants were butchered, and the young women were carried off. Some of the villages were so utterly destroyed that now there is no sign that such places existed.

At Gemerek the Turks joined the Armenians and drove away the raiders, who however carried away rather than to be spared for such a frightful fate. You can understand the ferocity of this attack upon the Christians in this city from the fact that the wife of a captain in the Turkish army watched the horrors from her window. She was so affected by what she saw that she has since that event become insane.

Some details of the massacre at Ourfa have been received from which it appears that among other horrors, 150 wounded Armenians were thrown down a well and petroleum poured over their bodies, after which the mass of human beings was set on fire. While the massacre was proceeding, a Moslem ascended to the steeple of the Armenian Church and began to call the faithful to prayer after the manner of of Sivas), who are now resident in Constantinople. For two months all their letters had remained unanswered. They could get neither word nor sign from their native valley and, with hearts wrung with anxiety, they addressed the bishop, at last resort. He replied that their village like many others, had been a scene of massacre and plunder: that about 330 Armenians had perished while seventy others were suffering from bad wounds. He added that of the four village pastors, three viz: Asdwadzadour ("the God-given"), Gronides and Wosgi, had been cruelly slain, and that Hemayag, the fourth, was now the sole teacher of the little flock. "your days of pilgrimage," the bishop added, "you should not be overwhelmed with the thoughts of your losses, think much of the past. Rather be before your eyes the deplorable condition of our fathers and brothers who have survived. Try to alleviate their distress."

In a letter from a sufferer at abkir, the writer says: "We have no bread to eat and no houses to live in—no shelter of any sort now. About three thousand Christians were killed here, but even their bodies are preferable to that of us who remain, for they are released from misery and hardship. The survivors are more to be pitied, exposed not only to cold, but to daily tortures and threatenings on the part of the Mohammedans. Hundreds have already been compelled to accept Islam. We must die, since there is no longer in the whole world pity and compassion. But even death does not trouble us—we do not even find a grave beside our fathers, for the Moslems do not intend to recognize us any more as Christians. We shall be buried in their Moslem graveyards and their inams will pray over our pitiless bodies. The thought of this makes us weep."

Zeitoun is still holding out against the Turkish troops, and according to cable-grams, the latest attempt to overcome the Armenian garrison was repulsed, and the Turks lost heavily in the assault. There are ominous rumors of impending massacres in Sivas and Van. Up to the present time, the latter city, which is the center of Relief work, has providentially escaped.

one thousand sheep and cattle and about one hundred horse loads of wheat and flour from the neighboring mills. The following figures are given by those who have the registers, as the result of the massacre in that city. Killed 348; wounded 190; young married women and girls abducted 50; houses burned 27. Some of the young women abducted have not yet been found. Some of them have been brought back one by one as their captors became tired of supporting them. Many parents seeing their daughters brought back by their ravishers had wished that their child had fallen by the sword the muezzin. He was quickly shot down by an Armenian. During the two days' disturbance 3,000 Christians were slaughtered by a single Hamidieh regiment, and a force of Bedouins, and all their property was either looted or destroyed.

A touching episode of the massacres is found in the correspondence, between Bedros, Bishop of Sivas and a number of the native Armenians of Danzhasar, (a village

AN OUTPOST OF THE CHURCH.

H. B. Gibbud's Work among the Victims of Sin in the Dives and Drinking Saloons of Syracuse, N. Y.

Few persons have any idea of the variety and extent of the work carried on at the stations which Mr. Gibbud calls, "the outposts of the church."

MR. AND MRS. H. B. GIBBUD.

...sive kind of warfare. The outpost of which Mr. Gibbud has charge, is at Syracuse, N. Y., in the midst of a neighborhood full of saloons, gambling houses and vicious resorts. Here he carries on his campaign against vice and crime and sin in many shapes. The ingenuity he has displayed in devising modes for reaching the victims of sin and Satan would do credit to a pushing business man, intent on bringing all the customers of the city to his store; and he has displayed no less energy in putting his various schemes into execution. He has unbounded faith in the power of the Gospel to redeem the very worst sinners and that faith, combined with an intense love for souls, impels him to use all kinds of means for getting the lost to avail themselves of it.

Mr. H. B. Gibbud, whose portrait with that of his devoted wife appears on this page, commenced his career as a Missionary in one of the lowest quarters of New York. In 1879 the writer remembers penetrating the purlieus of Baxter street, climbing a rickety stairway and finding at the end a room full of miserable creatures, ragged and rum-soaked, to whom Mr. Gibbud was explaining the way of salvation through Christ. The earnestness and presence of the man were marked in face and voice and manner. It was a most discouraging audience, but the features that discourage most men were those that attracted the worker. "Poor creatures," he said, when they were gone, "their need of the Gospel is awful. They cannot believe that Christ loves them. If I could only get them to believe that, they would begin to live." Mr. Gibbud toiled on in Ester street and succeeded in winning some to a better life. One depraved woman, Nellie Conroy by name, was among the rescued, and the change in her was with all the toil of the Mission. She became an earnest worker after her conversion, and was instrumental in rescuing many of her old associates. When Mr. Crittenton established the Florence Mission he induced Mr. Gibbud to devote his time to Missionary work in connection with it. In his down-town work he had gained experience, and he was glad of the larger field opened by Mr. Crittenton's enterprise. He labored there until 1887, when the calling of Providence pointed the way to his present sphere in Syracuse.

His first meeting there was held in a room with a Chinese laundry on one side and a low dive on the other, in a district familiarly known as Flatiron Block. It was not a cordial welcome that the missionary received, but he disarmed the hostility of some by declaring that he had not come to interfere with anyone's business, anyone's creed but simply to hold up Christ as the Friend of sinners and get them to quit their sins. The very first night a sailor who had strayed in, asked the missionary to pray for him and was eventually led to trust the Saviour whom his father and mother loved, and whose name he had first learned from their lips in his childhood home among the Scotch hills.

During the first three months, a meeting was held every night, and Mr. Gibbud had the happiness of hearing twenty-two persons renounce their sinful lives and declare their trust in Christ. Fourteen of these were drinking men, and of these eleven remained faithful and became sober, earnest Christian men. Three of the twenty-two were fallen women, and "all three," says Mr. Gibbud, "are good, virtuous Christian women today." Of the other five, two have since fallen asleep in Jesus, and the other three have been lost sight of. One of these first seventeen converts, the firstfruits of the Syracuse Mission is now deacon of a church, another is Superintendent of a Sunday School, and two are actively engaged in rescue work in another city. One of the men was attracted to the Mission while drinking in the saloon next door. There was only a thin board partition between the two places, and the singing of a hymn in the saloon could be plainly heard in the Mission. This man heard the hymn and it recalled old memories. He put down his glass of rum untasted and went into the Mission where he was encouraged to put his trust in Jesus. Only the night before, he had lost fifty dollars in a gambling den and was plotting a highway robbery to recoup his loss. He is now a respectable citizen and an active Christian worker.

After some two years of blessed work of this kind, the necessity of enlargement was evident to all. Mr. H. B. Gibbud, a kind friend of the missionary became treasurer of the enterprise and provided for its extension. He purchased a building in Mulberry st., and fitted it up for Mission purposes. A committee of management, composed of members of various evangelical churches, was organized and arrangements made for obtaining the necessary financial support. The new Mission, of which a picture, appears on this page, was opened on May 1, 1890 and since that time a meeting has been held there every night. The neighborhood is a notorious one, but Mr. Gibbud has had no difficulty with the denizens of even the worst kind. He adopts the principle of avoiding controversy and making no attempt to bring the law to bear upon them, tries to win them by the Gospel. The advantage of this method is that he is at liberty to go into any of the saloons and dives to seek the sinner and in several instances, the keepers, some of whom have not had all their natural kindness of heart eliminated by their associations, have actually sent for him and aided him in trying to save some young beginner, whom they were sorry to see starting on the road to ruin. This conciliatory method has had another notable result. The local Roman Catholic journal recently spoke in praise of the good results of his work, wished it godspeed and earnestly warned its Roman Catholic readers against interrupting the services, or casting slurs on a man whose sole business was rescuing men and women from sinful life and starting them on the road to heaven. Of the trophies won since the Mission opened, one is now a missionary laboring in Central China, three are preparing for missionary work in Africa, another is already preaching the Gospel in Chicago, another is a Salvation Army Captain, another is a successful evangelist and one promising young convert is in Mr. Moody's Institute preparing for a life of usefulness. What they might be doing now, if that Mission or some similar one had not been opened in Syracuse, they shudder to think of?

The principle of the Mission has been to use extraordinary means to reach classes which cannot be reached by the ordinary means of the Churches, and so to supplement the work of the Church, not to compete with it. Mr. Gibbud's efforts have been directed to seeking out the wanderer and the lost, and not to rely on their coming to the Mission. Many do come, when they are depressed or in trouble, and they are cordially welcomed, but they are few compared with those who must be sought. Acting on this principle Mr. Gibbud makes use of the Gospel wagon for outdoor services in the city and outlying districts. Services are regularly held in the prison, and the prisoners visited in their cells. He has also made friends with the owners of factories who will allow him occasionally to hold a service among their operatives at the noon hour, or some other convenient time. He is also a regular visitor to the

THE RESCUE MISSION, MULBERRY STREET, SYRACUSE, N. Y.

State fair, and has a service in the Market Square among the farmers. Every year a trip is made to the hop-fields of Central New York, and work is done among the hop-pickers. One year, as described in a previous number of this journal, Mr. Gibbud was able to maintain a Gospel boat on the Erie Canal, with most encouraging results. Meetings were held in out-of-the-way places that could be reached in no other way, and there were prospects of a very hopeful campaign by this means. But, unhappily, the boat caught fire and was destroyed a year after its dedication. Mr. Gibbud speaks sorrowfully of this closing of the avenue of usefulness from which so much had been expected, and is hoping that in some way God will provide the means for purchasing a new boat, to resume the work.

During the severe hardships of the business depression, Mr. Gibbud was enabled to give material aid to the destitute, feeding and providing shelter for the homeless. Out of this effort has grown a restaurant business like that carried on at the Bowery Mission in New York, where for a few pennies a hungry man can obtain a good, wholesome meal.

Little Children Help Armenia.

A Touching Example of Self-Denial in a Vermont Village.

AMERICAN children — the little ones of godly parentage — have been deeply touched by the sufferings of the poor children of Armenia. Missionaries and others have written of the nakedness of those little ones; of their wan faces and weak limbs; of their joyless lives, and their constant, terrible hunger. Comfort they cannot know, as even their parents, if spared by the Turkish and Kurdish slayers, are homeless wanderers. It is not to be wondered at that their story has made the hearts of our own happy little folks more tender and sympathizing. One of the most affecting instances of this childish sympathy is furnished us in a letter sent by a lady engaged in church work in New York City, which will be read with interest. She writes:

"The pastor of a little Vermont church decided to take up a collection in his small congregation for the relief of the Armenians. He had read of the terrible suffering of that people in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and elsewhere, and he gladly gave up for Armenia the modest portion which would have been his the coming Sabbath. His three little children also, the oldest a boy of eight years, caught the enthusiasm, and began to take a lively interest in the poor people across the water. As their mother told them how cruelly the little boys and girls of Armenia were being treated, the matter grew very real to them in their cosy Vermont home.

"Meanwhile, their papa had sent for some pamphlets which contained information of the Armenian persecution. These he intended to distribute throughout his scattered parish. Unfortunately, the circulars came only the Saturday evening before collection Sunday, and so could not be distributed father than the limits of the little village. This had been a busy week, and the good pastor was deep in his sermon for to-morrow. But the two oldest children, A — and E —, trudged bravely through the snow, up and down the village, scattering the circulars from house to house. Sunday morning dawned, and all three of the children, A —, E —, and I —, ran for their banks, and without any suggestion from their parents, emptied out their treasured store, begging to be allowed to give it all for the poor Armenians. Altogether their contribution amounted to about seventy-five cents. And as the collection was taken that morning, there surely could not have been any more cheerful givers than these three little ones, as they poured out their wee piles of coin into the box.

I wonder if any of my young readers would like to follow the example of these children, and deny themselves a little, in order to give something toward helping their suffering brothers and sisters in Armenia. Remember what Jesus said when he was on earth, that "inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Missionary Study.

A striking story of the study of a new language is that which Dr. A. T. Pierson tells in this month's Missionary Review, in his sketch of the life and work of Dr. George L. Mackay in Formosa. He says: Mackay felt, on landing in Formosa, that the first necessity was a knowledge of the language, especially the colloquial, as his aim, first of all, was the oral proclamation of the Gospel. He first mastered the eight tones of the Formosan dialect — and then a few words — enough to become a basis of communication with the natives. Then he deliberately accosted the herd-boys that tended the water buffaloes, won them over by concessions to their impertinent curiosity, showing them his watch, etc., until they awaited his coming with eagerness; and every day he spent hours with them, studying their manners, watching their words and noting down their phrases, until his vocabulary grew with astonishing rapidity. He shunned everybody that could speak his own language, that he might compel himself to learn theirs; and within five months he had so far drilled his tongue that he was actually able to preach his first sermon, and the text, "What must I do to be saved?" may show what sort of a beginning he made.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

Bible House, New York City.

Published for the Proprietor by Louis Klopsch, New York, at No. 100 Nassau Street.

It's All Nonsense!

THAT is what some worldly men say about religion. It is practically what Gallo said, when Sosthenes and his crowd dragged Paul before the judgment seat, "If they are questions about words and names of your own law, look to it yourselves; I am not minded to be a judge of these matters." So to practical business men of this day, religion seems to be a matter of mere emotion, if not pure fanaticism. At best it appears to be no more than a system of finely-spun theories, with perhaps some adaptation to old ladies and children, but of no possible use to a practical business world. Religious people seem to be continually wrangling over words and names and their own law.

We do not admit that such an opinion of the Christian religion is correct. The principles of Christianity are precisely what are needed in this bustling business life. But so long as such an opinion exists, the Christian needs to ask himself the question: What can I do to convince the world that my religion is of practical value?

The world's respect can never be won by religious cant. It is possible that we claim too much for ourselves at times. Do we not express in our hymns and prayers, heights of devotion which we have never reached and never expect to attain? Ought we to sing hymns which we know to be untrue to our own experiences? For example, how many of us can honestly sing these lines:

That morning Jesus came to me,
That morning Jesus came to me,
Love so amazing, so divine,
Drew me to him, drew me to him.

If Christ demands our all, how is it that we do not give him even ten per cent. of our income? Or can we sing sincerely these words?

My heart is full of love and joy,
My heart is full of love and joy,
My heart is full of love and joy,
My heart is full of love and joy.

Would not one of us be frightened out of his senses if, as he sang, the ceiling of the church were to part asunder, and an angel descend and invite him to the shoulder and say, "I have come to live your life away?" Yes, we all want to live as long as God will allow us. Why then do we sing what we do not feel? Such exhibitions of insincerity only widen the gulf between us and the practical world, instead of bringing it over.

We may win the world's respect in a more excellent way. Let us furnish living examples of religion as applied to everyday life. Let us first see that we ourselves are transformed into the image of Christ. Let us be upright in business, pure in conversation, and amiable in disposition. Let us do all in our power to soften the asperities of human experiences. Let us by all possible means show that the Christian religion means "Peace on earth, and good will toward men." Then will practical business men say, "We cannot do without a religion like that!"

Administration of the Oath.

WE must come back to the old-fashioned solemnity of an oath. It is a tremendous thing to uncover your head and put your hand on the inspired Book or lift your hand heavenward, and declare that a statement is "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me God." It is the height of all solemnity, and I do not know how a man can swear falsely and expect anything but earthly disaster and eternal perdition. But the truth is, there is so much blasphemy abroad, and men get so accustomed to hearing the name of God tossed about in familiar conversation, that when they come to take an affidavit it means nothing. Beside this, there are clerks of courts, and city and national officials who have a trifling and precipitate way of administering the oath which results in great prevalence of perjury. Now the oath is rattled off, as if with auctioneer's rignarole, and the command shot out from thoughtless lips, "Kiss the Book." Judges and clerks of courts, and aldermen, and notaries public. Let all insurance superintendents, and all whose business it is to administer the oath, see to it that more solemnity and emphasis be given to this tremendous act of invoking the attention of Jehovah. However brazen the cheek and adamant the heart of the perjurer, he will fail if the officer of the law, feeling the momentousness of the oath, shall look the witness in the eye and say with impressive tone: "You do solemnly swear that this statement is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth so help you God."

The Unfortunate.

THERE may be a thousand things which make it impossible for a man to pay his debts. It is a wickedness, and a common wickedness, to call every insolvent a scoundrel. There are many who have gone into bankruptcy who will stand the Judgment Day better than some of those who have paid all their debts. By the shrinkage in the value of goods and the unsaleableness of real estate thousands of our best men have been flung headlong, and yet a dishonest dollar has never stained their hands. They did not fail rich. They did not keep their palace on Staten Island. When their business went, their horses went; their fifteen hundred dollar carriage went, their bowling alley went—everything went. They did not pay forty cents on the dollar so that they might pocket the other sixty cents. They paid forty cents on the dollar because they had only forty cents. They did not make the coffin-lid of a deceased father, or brother, or friend the counter on which they gambled away trust funds. They failed as honestly as the brook fails when it dries up in August, or as fairly as the horse fails, dropping dead in harness before a load which he cannot drag up the hill.

Greedy is a fool. It clutches for so much, it catches nothing. Nine-tenths of the financial shipwrecks of the day come from the attempt to carry too big a cargo. Moderate in your expectations, you arrive at a reasonable competency. Extravagant and overbearing in your struggle, you land flat on the back. Men who have a hundred thousand dollars clutch for a million and get bankruptcy. Let all men of small means, or no means at all, take comfort in the fact that they have nothing in the way of large estate to set their children in a quarrel. Great wealth is a peril, not a triumph. It is a possession, but to those who are waiting for it. The Surrogate's office is an Armageddon. The bitterest feuds are seen between brothers and sisters about their father's will. It does not make any difference how sound a man's mind is when he makes his last testament, after his death mighty efforts will be made to prove his imbecile. It is always evidence of a testator's insanity, when he does not give you as many dollars as you think you ought to have. Amid all the inconveniences of limited finances, take the consolation that your grave will not probably be made the battleground for legal contestants.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Brother in Christ. — Do you think it is right for family prayer to be conducted by laymen? members of the family are at table eating and who only stop when they must kneel, and resume eating when the prayer is over?

There needs a change in the family arrangements. Either the hour of prayer or the hour for the meal should be changed so that they do not clash. The head of the family by a little tact might arrange this. The service should be decorous and reverential, and all who are present should give it their undivided attention.

F. J. Angell, Victoria, B. C.: "For Christ's Sake," Franklin, N. H. and others. What is the Bowery Mission, and how does any one become a member? What are a patron's duties?

It is a Mission in New York for the uplifting and helping of fallen men—social outcasts, who have lost heart and hope through sin or misfortune. You can become a patron by forwarding your name and address to this office. The duties of a patron of the Bowery Mission have already been repeatedly explained in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He or she is one of a number who are enrolled and who agree to take a personal interest in the progress of the work. Prayers and moral influence are requested, the patron is entitled to receive regular reports of the Mission's work, to correspond with and visit it if agreeable. He or she is expected to contribute once a year (about May 15), and no more, as means may permit and conscience direct.

Reader, Rancocas, N. J. Do you think a minister of the Gospel is doing wrong in riding a bicycle to and from his church on Sunday?

The mere act of riding a bicycle is not in itself sinful, and if it is the only available means of reaching the church on Sunday it may therefore be excusable. On the other hand, if walking or riding in the usual way be discarded for the sake of the exercise or exhilaration bicycle riding affords, it is clearly wrong. Besides, dignity of action and a noble decorum should be inseparable from the high office of spiritual teacher, and anything that impairs the dignity of that office necessarily impairs its influence as well.

Mrs. O. Noble, Worthington, Ind.: 1. How can I become interested in missionary work? 2. Why should I be so interested?

1. Every Christian church has its missionary society whose members will be glad to receive you as one of their number. If this method is not practicable, you should write to any of the Missionary Boards you may select: the Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist or the American Board. The secretaries will send you all the literature needed for information. If the home missionary field be preferred, address the American Sunday School Union, Philadelphia. 2. Because it is the duty of all who believe in the Lord Jesus to aid in spreading his Gospel until every tongue and nation shall declare his name. Besides, helping others, spiritually or materially, is the pleasantest work in the world and makes the doer happy.

A. B. Vinson, Ga.: 1. If a wife secures a divorce from her husband by false testimony, and then, if a minister, to quit the ministry, or if a layman should refrain from preaching if he feels that he is recalled? 2. May he marry again?

1. If the man is innocent of wrongdoing there is no valid reason why he should not preach, after the wrong has been done to him. We do not know the specific circumstances you have in mind, but the fact of a man having suffered wrong cannot debar him from Christian service. He ought, however, to be careful that his conduct bring no reproach on the church. If he has been indiscreet and has given cause for people to suspect him of misconduct, he might wisely and for the sake of others avoid prominence. He should seek advice from some good man who knows the facts. 2. If his wife marries again he is justified in marrying.

Reader, Malvern, Ia.: If a minister refuses to take part in a revival meeting, or in a religious conference, or in a church of the denomination, or even to attend the meeting, or even to attend in believing that he is not converted himself?

That fact alone is not sufficient evidence. A man may be so constituted that it would be painful to him to listen to the preaching of the Evangelist and to witness his methods. He might rejoice in the conversions and might pray for a blessing on the services, yet be unable to bear the ordeal of attending. There was a very good man in New York, in whose success in dealing with the fallen every Christian minister, who used to say things that shocked the sensibilities of Christian people, learned from childhood to be reverent in speaking of sacred things. God owned and blessed his work but his talks were adapted to a particular class and no Christian was deserving of blame for staying away. Do not ever be in a hurry to declare that a man and an especial minister is not converted. Charity thinks no evil.

S. Clarke, Chicago, Ill.: Considering how many happy marriages there are, would it not be better to permit divorces to take place when band and wife quarrel?

Apart from the Scriptural injunction, which Christ did not relax, but rather made more stringent, we think it would be bad publicity to permit divorces to take place on ground of quarrel. It would lead to a multiplication of divorces which would be a misfortune. In many cases it would also be bad for the persons concerned. There are many couples who have made up their quarrels and are now glad that they did so, while the law had been so lax as you suggest, who have separated and been sorry for it.

James Howard, Norwalk, Conn.: Does the passage in Hebrews 7:12 imply that Melchizedek was a spirit or an angel?

No, in speaking of him as being with father, mother, &c., it simply means that he was inconspicuous. Little was known of him, he had no ancestry. His ancestors were "bodies," as they say in Europe when a comes of a family not ranking among the aristocracy. This man though without ordination, without Levitical appointment, received a kind of homage from the great-grandfather of Levi himself. The writer of the Epistle, arguing that Christ, though not of the tribe of Levi, might belong to a higher order of priesthood.

L. D. J.: In the miracle described in Luke 11:14, did the man recover when Christ expelled the demon, or not until later when he had been healed? Would not the forgiveness of his sins be his healing?

The healing seems to have come after Christ wished to provoke a challenge, that might point a lesson. The Pharisees would be sure to protest against his assuming a right to forgive sins. Having made their protest, the answer would be more cogent. The proof that he had the power to do some of them could not test, was that he did a work that was plain and obvious and susceptible of proof. Like the other miracles, Christ wished this to lead the spectators to trust in him and the spiritual blessing.

E. P. Snyder, New York: Are there any Scriptures that prove that the heathen idolaters who have heard of Christ will be lost or saved?

No direct proofs. The Bible holds out a hope of salvation in such a case, but it was no need that it should. It is not our business. They are in God's hand and he will do what is just and right. Our plain duty is to send the Gospel to them, and we must be as earnest in doing so, as if we knew that they would be surely lost if we did not do it. We do not know; but there is no ground for hope, save in the infinite love of Christ's words (Luke 12:48) about the servant who knew not his Lord's will appear to indicate that the circumstance of ignorance is not overlooked in the judgment.

J. P. F., Halifax, N. S.: 1. Is it Scriptural to teach that conversion makes him all safe for eternity? 2. What does Paul mean in I. Tim. 4:18 Timothy saving himself and his hearers? What is the meaning of benevolence and eternal life, in I. Timothy 6:19?

1. It is Scriptural to insist on the necessity of conversion before a man can be safe for eternity. Christ was very explicit on this point (See John 3:5). But conversion is the beginning. The man should be led to growth in grace and knowledge, and to be daily more like Christ. But if a man were to die soon after his conversion, before he had opportunity for Christian growth, he would be safe for eternity. "Whosoever believeth in him shall not perish." 2. That Timothy was to discharge the responsibility of his trusty faithful preaching. He would save himself from reproach and from condemnation. (See Ezek. 33:9.) His preaching, too, if faithful, would keep his hearers from going astray. 3. Paul was comparing the grudging Christian with one who did good, and pointing out how much better it was to have God's approval than to die leaving a fortune behind. It is the same line of teaching as that of Christ in Matt. 25:31-46.

W. M. B., Excelsior, Wis.: It does not appear to have been the wisest method of settling the matter. The better way would have been to invite them to stay and to speak kindly, showing them that the Bible has a church in any other place, and that the Bible is a guide to the production of the spirit of Christ. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The New Light.

EXPERIMENTS made in this country with Prof. Roentgen's new light, prove that it has all the merits he claimed for it. There can be no doubt that it is one of the most important discoveries of the age. As illustrations of the uses to which it may be put, Prof. Fox, of Montreal, reports finding the position of a bullet in a man's leg which the doctors had previously been unable to locate. Another instance is that of a man suffering from paralysis. The surgeons believed that his injury was due to some injury, but could find any wound. He was photographed with the new light, and the photograph showed the broken blade of a pen-knife in the region of the spine. This was extracted and the paralysis was immediately relieved. In a hospital at Berne, Switzerland, the same means was employed to find a needle in the body of a child, and was successful. In Vienna, a photograph was taken of a glass-worker, who had been injured and had suffered for several years from the presence in his body of a piece of glass, which the surgeons could not find. The position of the glass was clearly marked on the plate; it was removed and the man recovered. On this is a photograph of Prof. Roentgen, the discoverer of the light. His full name is Wilhelm Conrad Roentgen. He holds the office of Professor of Physics at the University of Wurzburg, in Bavaria, Germany. He is a remarkably able man. He died at Zurich in Switzerland and afterwards taught at Strasburg and Wurzburg. He has been at Wurzburg since 1878. He is of Dutch birth. The accompanying picture shows how a hand looks when photographed with the light, and in a pair of eye-glasses inside a leather case appears in the photograph. The light by which the photographs are produced is yet a mystery. It proceeds from what is known as a Crookes tube, that is, a glass tube or bulb, from which the air has been exhausted, and into which a copper wire is inserted. When the wire is charged with a strong electric current, the tube glows with a pale violet, green, and white light. But it is believed that this light is not that which produces the photograph. It is thought that invisible rays proceeding from one end of the tube are the powerful agent in use. Prof. Roentgen calls them "X rays." They penetrate objects impervious to ordinary light, while they are intercepted by glass. A pine board an inch thick does not stop them, nor does paper, nor cloth, nor thin plates of aluminum, but steel and copper are impervious but not in equal degree. Thus objects have been photographed inside a wooden box, and as is seen in the illustration, the rays pass through the leather case and show the glasses, and through the flesh of the hand and show the bones. When we reflect that this power has been in existence all along, unknown to us, and that all the secrets of nature must be known to the Creator, we realize how true are the prophet's words:

He revealeth the deep and secret things: he knoweth what is in the darkness and the light dwelleth with him. Daniel 2:22.

Wilson Seven Years at Work.

The death of a highly respected citizen of Brooklyn occurred recently under peculiar circumstances. The man was a Scotchman of strong constitution, very active and vigorous. He owned several horses of which he was very fond. One of them was ill with glanders some seven years ago, and his owner, in lancing it, contracted some of the poison through a cut on his hand. He was not aware of the fact at the time, but three years afterward, the effects of the poison showed themselves in his hand. He was in Paris at the time and consulted an eminent French surgeon, who told him that he must have part of his hand amputated to save his life. The patient consented and the operation was performed; but the poison had spread farther than the surgeon thought and the arm was cut off above the elbow. It was hoped that the effects of the poison were then completely eradicated, but a year afterward, his leg showed an affection like the one on his hand. The patient consulted a Brooklyn physician and by his advice had his leg amputated. Recently the other leg became affected and the doctors proposed to amputate that, but the sufferer declared he would lose no more limbs. He was firm in his resolution and as he had been warned, death has been the penalty. The poison evidently was in the blood and as the doctors could not eradicate it the amputation of the limbs in which its effects showed themselves, only temporarily postponed the inevitable result. In this it was like the sin that works in human nature.

THE NEW WONDER IN PHOTOGRAPHY.
Eye-glasses made visible through leather case.

The attempts at self-reformation which men sometimes make in their own strength, always end in failure, until they go to God and ask him to give them a new heart.

For from within out of the heart of men proceed evil thoughts, etc. (Mark 7: 21).

A Strange Fright.

A singular illustration of the influence of use and wont comes from a keeper of a drug-store in Chicago. Late one evening a business man who lives on the South side, arrived in the suburb by train. He had a few blocks to walk to reach his home. It had been a hard day with him. In his office in the city he had toiled steadily all day, and after the time of closing came he had been grappling with complicated problems until near midnight. At last, he shut his books and started for home. He was tired out but his brain would not rest. All the way, on the train, in spite of his efforts to turn his attention to other subjects, his mind returned persistently to his business, in new effort to solve the problems that had exhausted him. They were still with him as he walked from the station and entered the street in which he lived. He was painfully alert, wakeful and sensitive. Suddenly he became oppressed with a strange sense of having lost his way. The street he had walked hundreds of times was somehow not the same. He stopped in a kind of dumb terror. He tried to convince himself that he was right, but could not. He felt that something unusual had happened, something fatal, but no power of analysis would explain it to him. He concluded he was losing his senses through overstrain of business worry. He hurried forward to the next block where the lights of a drug-store illumined the pavement. He entered and sank into a chair perspiring with an inexplicable horror. The store-keeper was out, but he came in a minute later and casually remarked that he wondered how long it would be before they started the cable again. That word furnished the clue to his visitor's collapse. The strange sensation was due to the unthought silence of the street which night and day he was accustomed to hear humming with the surface cars. In his nervous condition the silence was as the silence of death, and his mind was too full to detect what it was that was new and unusual. The cable started a few minutes later and the man soothed by the familiar noise went contentedly to his home relieved of his strange terror. He had not given a thought to the noise until its cessation produced a silence that in his nervous condition was oppressive. So it is with many of the blessings of our own lives, which we enjoy without recognizing them, or being thankful for them. God sometimes withdraws them that we may realize their value and our obligations.

I will go and return to my place. . . in their affliction they will seek me. (Hosea 5: 15).

When a Chinaman is a Citizen.

An important citizenship suit was tried before Judge Morrow of the United States District Court in San Francisco recently. It arose out of the action of the Collector of the Port in excluding a returning Chinaman on the ground that he was a laborer. The Chinaman disputed his ruling, and claimed citizenship. He was born here, and had merely been to China on a visit. When the case came up for trial the District Attorney contended the Collector was right in excluding the Chinaman when he returned from his visit. In handing down his decision, Judge Morrow denied the argument. The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, he said, assured to any person born in the country all the rights of a citizen of the United States, whatever the nationality of his parents, and though he might not be a citizen of any State. The Chinaman consequently had a perfect right to return to the country of his birth, despite the Exclusion Act. If the decision is confirmed by the Supreme Court the Chinaman will win an important victory, and his citizenship will be based on the Constitution as supreme over State laws. It may be that at the last we shall find that some are citizens of Christ's kingdom whom, like Irving and others, the Church on earth has excluded. The Lord intimated that his sheep were not all of one fold.

Other sheep I have which are not of this fold.

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. W. S. Rainsford, D.D., Rector of St. George's Church, New York, has been conducting a ten days' series of Evangelical services in Cincinnati, O. The meetings were held in the Opera House which was well filled at every service.

A Cable Dispatch announces that on February 8, Dr. A. T. Pierson, formerly of Philadelphia, was baptized by immersion at Crofton, England. His warm friend, Dr. J. A. Spurgeon, brother of the late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, performed the ceremony.

Successful Evangelistic Services have been conducted by Evangelists Leavelle and Leavelle at the Presbyterian Church, St. Louis, Mo. Three churches united in the movement. Over three hundred persons made profession of faith during the progress of the meetings.

A Report of a Remarkable conversion which took place at Seoul, Korea, is published by the Independent. It states that on a recent Sunday a missionary laboring in that city administered baptism at the same service to an aged woman and to her youngest descendant, an infant to whom she is great-great grandmother.

Rev. Francis E. Smiley of Denver, Colo., who conducted the successful evangelist campaign in that city last winter, has accepted an invitation from the Ministerial Alliance to direct revival meetings of the united churches of Pueblo, Colo.

Mr. N. S. Anderson, Secretary of Bethany Church, Philadelphia, asks us to state that Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman's acceptance of the pastorate of that Church does not imply his withdrawal from the evangelistic field. The church has arranged for him to be absent from the pulpit for three months every winter in order that he may continue his revival work. This year Dr. Chapman expects to hold services in New York, Brooklyn, and Burlington, Ia.

Dr. L. W. Munhall commenced a series of services at Dubuque, Ia., on Feb. 2. The churches joining in the movement were the First Baptist, Summit Congregational and the Main Street Methodist Church. Meetings are being held every afternoon and evening and a Parlor meeting for women only in the mornings. Overflow meetings are held in the Presbyterian Church, at which the ministers give Gospel addresses. Dr. Munhall takes part in both services.

The whole Christian Church has been Bereaved in the death of Rev. Talbot W. Chambers, D.D., pastor of the Collegiate Dutch Church in New York. Dr. Chambers was a great Biblical scholar as well as a famous preacher. He was a member of the American Company of Revisers of the Old Testament and an able writer on Biblical criticism. Dr. Chambers was stricken with pneumonia but a short time before his death. He was seventy-seven years of age.

Statistics of the Presbyterian Church in Canada for the past twenty-five years show a marvelous increase of activity. In the work of French Evangelization, the fields have increased from 2 to 36; the preaching stations from 3 to 93; the missionaries and teachers from 5 to 68, and the communications from 141 to 1200. In Foreign Missions the number of missionaries has grown from 8 to 90, and the income has increased from $19,000 to $114,000.

Three Prize Banners will be Awarded at the Washington National Convention to three Christian Endeavor local unions. The first banner will go to the union making the best showing in the way of definite and practical Christian citizenship work. The second will be awarded to the local union having the largest number of individual members who give not less than one-tenth of their income to God. The third, or fellowship banner, will be secured by the union organizing the largest number of Christian Endeavor Societies of any kind.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey has been Visiting the Pacific Coast. A San Diego journal says that on Feb. 24, he sang at the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches of that city and gave an address describing the origin of the hymns he sang. The author of the hymn "Ninety and Nine" was a lady living at Melrose, Scotland. Mr. Sankey made the acquaintance of her family while traveling in Scotland twenty-two years ago. The author was dead, but her family were much gratified by the appreciation of the noted singer, who was then thrilling the churches of Scotland with his gospel songs.

A Circular signed by Twenty-seven Eminent men has been issued, suggesting that in all public celebrations of Washington's birthday this year the question of our relations with the British Government and people should be considered. Suggestions may be made as to the best mode of deciding controversies between the two nations and as to the advisability of arranging by formal treaty for the organization of a permanent board of arbitration. Reports of the proceedings should be sent to Dr. Wm. C. Gray, 69 Dearborn St., Chicago, or to Mr. Wm. E. Dodge, 11 Cliff St., New York, who will arrange them for transmission to the President and the English Government.

"Mary and the Kid."

THE fog lay yellow and blanket-like over our harbor's mouth, and was so thick and smothering that shapes in the street loomed vague and indistinct, and one could scarcely see his neighbor, nor the house across the way.

Mary Reynolds was getting her husband's breakfast in a back room on the fourth floor of a tenement house in Rivington street. It was very early in the morning, at least you, who are accustomed to later rising, would have thought so, but sounds of frying fish and potatoes, the aroma of coffee, the crying of babies, and the general stir of life, indicated that here, men and women began their day before it was light. The shops and factories, which started at seven o'clock sharp, required operatives who had been up "soon in the morning," as our Southern friends say, to get their breakfast over, and to take the journey from home to the place of business. A good many men, John Reynolds among them, went to work earlier. He relieved a man on the Bridge, and must be at his post at half-past five.

Poor Mary was a faded, dragged-out creature, with a heavy baby nursing and pulling down her strength, very fractious just now with its teeth. Mary was a poor manager, a wretched cook, and a quick-tempered, nervous creature, whose tongue was always ready with an angry reply. As a saleswoman in Green's great shop, she had been pretty, deft-handed, energetic, and light-hearted; but marriage with John Reynolds, and living in his little home, had taken away the ease and irresponsibility of her girlish life, and worn her pallid face into a chronic frown. If girls only knew a little more about housewifery, how to make their money go farthest, how to roast and boil and make nice, appetizing stews and hashes, and to keep a house bright and clean, many of them would be happier in married life than they are.

"Hurry up, Mary!" cried John. "If you poke so, I'll have to go without my breakfast. I've been late twice this month, all owing to you, and I'll be bounced next thing."

"I'm hurrying as much as I can," said Mary, "but the stove won't burn. There's your breakfast now." And she set the muddy coffee, baker's bread, and fat, greasy slice of ham before the man, going herself to get the baby who was screaming till he was black in the face, from the dark room adjoining.

"Do make the kid shut up," growled John. "A fellow never has any peace at home."

"You might have some sympathy with the baby, John. I've been up half the night with him, and I don't complain. But you are so cross and unfeeling!"

"Well, cross or not, I'll take myself off. One of these days, I'll go out and I'll not come back any more!"

John flung himself down the stairs, and out into the thick muck of the street. By the time he had gone a block he was heaving and raging at Mary, but he did not care very much about it, for what with the fog and the cold and the baby crying, he was greatly afraid that he would lose his work. Crowds of anxious men and women were waiting for the fog to clear away, and the sun to come out. It made him shiver beneath his rough coat. Somehow he pressed on, he was both cold and hungry, but he must get to his work. "Mary and the kid," he said to himself; "I wish I'd kissed the kid, and not been so horrid to Mary," his thought ran to and fro as he joined the crowd on the Bridge, and just gained a foothold on the rear platform of the last outgoing car of a train.

At ten o'clock that morning, Mary Reynolds went to the corner-store for three cents' worth of soup vegetables and a can of condensed milk. She had to pass a bulletin-board, stuck up near the branch office of a newspaper, and there, in magnified capitals, she saw:

"FRIGHTFUL CRASH ON THE BRIDGE EARLY THIS MORNING. GREAT LOSS OF LIFE. CARS TELESKOPED." Her cheek paled, her eyes grew dim. John worked on the Bridge cars, and he had been due in the early morning. She groped her way homeward, putting her narrow bone on to boil for soup, and hushing her querulous babe, all the while in a worry about her husband. Harsh words at parting leave a hard ache in the breast, as wives and husbands know.

A neighbor's boy rushed in, "Mother says, Mr. Reynolds was likely hurt, Mrs. Reynolds," he shouted, with the usual thoughtlessness of a boy, and a boy's keen pleasure in making a sensation, "They say a brakeman was killed right out," he added, with the cheerfulness of a person imparting good news.

Mary Reynolds pushed the lad out of her door, and locked it. One instant she stood with both hands holding her head. The next she dropped to the floor, on her knees, praying, as she had not prayed in years:

"Oh! my God, my God in heaven, for Christ's sake, bring John back to me, and I'll love him, and be good to him. I'll look after his shirt-buttons, Lord, and learn to cook his dinner, and I won't scold, and fret. Oh! dear Lord, if you'll let my John come back."

It doesn't sound quite like a proper prayer, I know, but it is the prayer poor Mary offered, and she was on her knees, and calling with all her heart on God, when a loud knock came to the locked door. She rose and opened it, and in came John, big, and bluff, and hearty, and not the least hurt. He gathered her close in his arms, and said, "Mary, I was next door to being killed; next door, but I escaped. The poor fellow on the car next mine had both legs cut off, they've taken him to the hospital, and he'll die. But then I thought of you and the kid, and I'm going to be a better man. I've got to go back to my work, but I had to come home, to let you know I was all right."

On the floor below the Reynolds flat, there lived an old French mother and her wife Marguerite. Marguerite's small house-keeping was very frugal but she knew the secret of the pot au feu, she had learned cooking as a fine art in la belle Paris. To her went meekly Mary Reynolds a few days later, begging to be taught something about cooking, and the old French-woman was pleased and took a kind interest, and John found before long that his wages went farther, and that the food bought at the market was not ruined on the fire. The little home grew tidy, and it became a rare pleasure at nightfall to go home to "Mary and the kid."

Their Coffins Side by Side.

The Funeral of Two Converts at the Bowery Mission—Crowds at the Services.

NEVER, since its doors were first opened for the preaching of the Gospel of Christian helpfulness for the lost and degraded men, has the Bowery Mission presented such a scene as that which took place there on the afternoon of Monday, Feb. 10. In the Mission Hall two caskets lay side by side, and upon the lid of each were clusters of fragrant flowers. Several hundred men thronged the Mission, even the staircase and entrances being crowded. Reverently they had gathered there to pay the last tribute of affectionate esteem to two men who had formerly been attend-the Master. Disabaye soon found employment and never received or accepted any aid from the Mission; but out of his earning he relieved the needs of many in distress.

The circumstances of the double funeral were most singular. On Sunday morning last, while services were being conducted by Mrs. Bird at the Mission, the Rev. John Lewis Clarke of the Marble Collegiate Church, Fifth Ave. and 29th Street, New York, called and handed Superintendent Hughes a telegram from Disabaye's mother requesting that her son, whose body was then in the hands of an undertaker, should be buried. It was at once agreed that he should be buried near the Mission, and the physician in charge of the Mission Dispensary was sent to the hospital to make the necessary arrangements. Meantime, Moore had died some two hours earlier in a different ward of the same hospital; so both were brought to the Mission, where the caskets were placed side by side. The services were conducted by Rev. Stephen Merritt, assisted by Rev. John Lewis Clarke, Dr. Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, president. The services were quite simple and were an object lesson of the deepest import to those present.

Mrs. Bird, in a few brief sentences, told the story of one of the men. She said:

Boys, we are to-day, as one large sorrowing family. My heart is too full for utterance. Two of our number have suddenly been removed, and we here to pay to their memory this tribute. I remember Frank very well. He came in here quite often. He always sat in the same place, always gave the same testimony. It seemed to me as though I can at this moment hear him say: "Boys I was hungry and so cold the first night I came into the Bowery Mission. There was a big crowd here that night, and I was afraid I would not be able to get in, but I pushed through and I found a seat, and got a cup of coffee and a sandwich, and then, afterwards, I listened to such beautiful words that I felt that I had never been cold or hungry before. I only wished I might have the joy in my heart which the men in the meeting were speaking. After a little while I learned to know Jesus, and I learned to love him, and he has taken care of me ever since I gave him my heart, and he has found work for me and food and clothing, and I am so happy to-night. I wish you, I would give your hearts to Jesus. I find that wonderful Saviour who does so much for our hearts and lives." Then Frank would sit down. As he lies there in his casket my heart can realize what Frank would say if he could but talk. I am sure he would say: "Boys, give your hearts to the Lord. Put your hand here, and let him lead you, and having started, never never stop." I wonder who it is that these two should have been selected? But I know best, and may we heed the warning, like these two be prepared to meet our God.

Dr. Klopsch made a brief address, in the course of which he said:

Stephen Merritt, who made the opening remarks on this occasion, once met Marion Harland, the old writer, at my office, and she said to him: "Merritt, don't you think in all our efforts to do very much is necessarily wasted; much of it is much of money, much of love?" Mr. Merritt responded: "That is none of my business. I am to do and to give, and the rest I leave with God." I am sure that the only doubt as to the wisdom of such a course, it would have been fully removed, when a few moments ago, Mrs. Bird said to me: "Brother Klopsch, for all the money and all the time spent in the Bowery Mission, it is full compensation in the thought that these precious souls were saved through its instrumentality." And here in the presence of God, and of the host of ministering spirits now hovering around this scene of mingled sorrow and triumph, I rejoice that these two precious souls came within the healing ministrations of the Bowery Mission.

These two men came in here, and like the men of old, inquired diligently after one Jesus, and that said, "In the day that ye seek me will your heart, I will be found of you," and "He cometh to me, I will in no wise send him," and "I have found unto him as the only-begotten Son of the Father, the one who gathered together the lost and the ten thousand, whose grace was sufficient to do the pardoning, and through the merits of which they entered through the pearly gates, washed in the blood of the Lamb. The last memory of one is inscribed on his coffin plate. He was dying, he looked up and said: 'Tell Mrs. Bird I'm well with my soul.' The testimony of another was repeated, when he was told that he was doing too much and giving more than a man's limited means ought to give, he replied: 'Well, I gave myself to God, I did not give him my money, but I gave him my whole hand and whole heart.'

It is for us who remain to continue the warfare the battle of faith, to gain the victory again, to extend the boundaries of the Kingdom of God, but to those two men who lie before us, silent and so cold, it is far well to trouble, far to temptation, far well to anxiety, far well to get, far well to homelessness, and welcome to heaven, welcome to home, welcome to the Redeemer, welcome to the crown of glory, and welcome to eternal rest and everlasting peace.

The bodies were interred in Mt. Olivet Cemetery the same afternoon.

Loyalty's Obligations.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor topic for the Week Beginning March 1. Date 10:25-37.

LOYALTY is a word that strikes a chord with which our ears should be familiar. Christ is a king—our King. With all his humility, his patience and gentleness, he never concealed his claim to kingship. True, his kingdom, as he said, is not of this world, but it is in the world, and it is here that men may enter and do service. We speak of Christ as a Saviour and as a Teacher, but it must never be forgotten that he is a King. As there are definite conditions of entrance into his kingdom, so there are laws for the government and guidance of those who have entered it. Personal loyalty is the first and chief of these. Christianity is no system of philosophy, though it is philosophical; it is not an ecclesiastical system, though a church has developed from it; it is a kingdom with every subject in allegiance to the King. What, then, does this loyalty involve?

It is surprising how few we see the laws Christ laid upon his people. Considering the system from which Christianity was evolved, with its minute and stringent regulations, considering the class from which the first members of the kingdom came, it is remarkable that Christ should have given so few commands. He relied mainly on the power that the new life, which he imparted, would have in shaping life. Christians would not be satisfied with one mold, but men of many minds, modes of thought, activities and temperaments. The new life would show itself in variety of ways. In some, it would be joined to the impetuous nature, as in Peter; in others to the zealous, as in Paul; in others, to the gentle, as in John. Each man carried to the kingdom his personal characteristics, and there were no us for them. With this liberty there was to be one overruling, all-pervading principle—that of love. Christ was sure that if his follower's heart was full of love to him and others, his life would be right. He set no limits to this principle, but was at some pains to remove the limits human prejudice had set up. A man naturally loved his family, and had a clannish love for his countrymen, but it went no further. The lawyer's question, in the passage on which this topic is based, shows the narrow limits common at the time. "Who is my neighbor?" Christ inverts his question in answering it. "To whom am I neighbor?" is the question the lawyer is invited to ask himself. Active kindness, even to a stranger, to a man of another race, to a man who in truth would resent kindness and an insult, is enjoined by the parable. Love must be an enthusiasm, running out to seek objects on which to expend itself. It must not only be given to persons having a claim upon it, but to persons who had related such claims. Among the few laws Christ enacted for his kingdom this is conspicuous, and he has joined it with loyalty to himself. We are to be kind to the poor and those who need kindness and will regard it as done to himself. They are his representatives. "Inasmuch as ye do it unto them," he represents himself saying at the last, "ye did it unto me." This is the test of loyalty, that we love our neighbor, and if, like the lawyer, we ask, "Who is my neighbor?" the parable answers, "the man who is in need of neighborly help."

Free'y Give.

"Freely ye have received, freely give."

IN this world of sin and sorrow,
'Tis a lesson we should heed;
Heap not treasure for to-morrow
You may never, never need.

There are needy ones around us,
Struggling with the toil of life.
Give to them and help them onward,
Up and onward through the strife.

Deck not thou thyself with jewels,
Silken raiment, gold and gem;
While thy poor but worthy brother
Toils the stream of life to stem.

When thou givest do not 'grudge it;
Freely give as Jesus gave—

When upon the Cross he perished—
Gave his life, the world to save.

'Tis no credit for us mortals
Just to give what we can spare—
Spare from our great store of plenty—
There's no self-denial there.

If we would be blest in giving,
We must make some sacrifice;
When we stand before our Maker,
Only that will then suffice.

If from out the wiles of Satan,
But one lost one we can save;
In the land beyond the river,
We a crown of life shall have.

The Midnight Cry.

The Clues Prophecy Gives us as to the Nature and Characteristics of the Warning.

BY REV. E. J. HYTCHE.

Those who do not allegorise unfulfilled prophecy, but believe that, like all that has been fulfilled, it means what it says, and so is to be construed literally—there are some predictions pertaining to the last days of this dispensation about which there cannot be any controversy. For example, there cannot be any doubt that the living saints will be translated before the full revelation of Antichrist, not only as Autocrat of the revived Roman Empire, but as the god of this world. For, as the Church of the First Born, according to Zech. 14: 3-5, and Rev. 19: 14, will accompany our Lord when his feet again stand upon Mount Olivet, it necessarily follows that their rapture had taken place before that event.

But other connected events are not so definitely pre-recorded as to leave no room for inference or doubt. An example is that midnight cry which will precede and proclaim the rapture of the Church. With the Divine axiom, "The thing which hath been, it is that which shall be: and there is no new thing under the sun," we are prepared to find something in sacred history analogous to this momentous event. Thus it is, that when the Most High slew the first-born of all the Egyptians, it was "at midnight" that this penalty was inflicted on the house of Pharaoh and his people, who had doubtless supported his oppression of the Israelites.

Of this future midnight cry, we read in Matt. 25: 1-6. Our Lord, in narrating the signs of this Second Advent, said that, "The kingdom of heaven shall be likened unto ten virgins who took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom, and five of them were wise, and five were foolish. While the Bridegroom tarried they all dozed or slept; and at midnight there was a cry—Behold the Bridegroom cometh—go ye out to meet him."

It is in accordance with all God's past dealings with his children that no deliverance is vouchsafed nor any penalty inflicted on the rebellious without prior warning. So it is here; for our Lord in pre-narrating the events which will herald the Second Advent said (Mark 13: 35-37), "Watch ye therefore, for ye know not when the Master of the house cometh—at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning." And lest any one in these last days should presume that our Lord restricted his warning to the disciples then present, he added, "What I say unto you, I say unto all—watch." This solemn warning was reiterated by the apostle Paul, who said (1 Thes. 5: 3-8), "Ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you unawares."

Now what this midnight cry is, is not revealed, and various suggestions have been made as to its character. But in this conflict of opinion, we have more certainty as to what it will not be:

It cannot be the testimony of the living church as to the imminent coming of Christ. For we read that both wise and foolish virgins dozed or slept—tired out with long waiting, it may be, and so losing this hope of the church through the many disappointments as regards its proximity. And thus it was not until these slumberers were aroused from their guilty sleep at midnight, that they "arose and trimmed their torches."

(To be Continued.)

Sorrow in a Palace Home.

The Widow of the Late Prince Henry and her Children at Windsor.

SORROW comes alike to the palace and the hovel, to the homes of the rich and the cottages of the poor. There is this difference only: that the sorrows of those in high station are seen of the world, while those in humbler life bear their griefs alone, save for the Great Comforter whose balm is ready to be poured upon every heart that turns toward Himself.

An empire was saddened lately, when the news came to England of the death of Prince Henry of Battenberg in Africa. But the passing sympathy of a nation, grateful though it ought to be, could do little to bind up the wounded and broken hearts in the home at Windsor, where the bereaved Princess Beatrice and her children live during a part of each year. Ever since their marriage the Prince and Princess have lived as members of the Queen's own household, whether at Windsor or in the Isle of Wight or at Balmoral in Scotland. The children (who are shown in our illustration, from a photograph in the London Illustrated News), are four in number: the eldest, Alexander, a boy of nine, a daughter, Princess Victoria Ena, aged eight, and two younger boys, Leopold and Maurice, aged six and four respectively. Princess Beatrice, the widowed mother, is the youngest daughter of the Queen, and together with her children has been a great favorite with the English people.

Windsor Castle is less than an hour's ride from London, and is situated on the right bank of the Thames. It is a stately group of buildings, rich in historical associations, and has been for many centuries a royal residence. Many of the English Kings are buried there. The living rooms, one of which is shown in the picture, were remodeled by Sir Jeffrey Wyatville, and contain mantelpieces and ceilings of the ornate decorative style of three and four centuries ago.

Little Ministers.

Every child may be a minister if he chooses, and if he be trained in the fear and love of the Father. The child Samuel, we are told, "ministered before the Lord, being a child." Rather a tiny little minister he must have been. He was too young to preach, but yet maybe he preached in his own way, without knowing it; for there are ever so many ways of ministering before the Lord. I know a father, writes J. Reid Howatt, whose children preach to him every morning, and yet they don't know that they are preaching. Every morning they come down and say their prayers by his side, and when these three little heads are bowed down while they are speaking to God, that father feels he should be a good man and set a good example, for fear these dear children should go wrong. So you see they preach though they don't know it. And that is one way in which you "minister before the Lord," when you pray. You make father and mother happier, and so you minister to them before the Lord.

One night when a family were all gathered round the fire, a little girl looked up and asked: "Papa, why does everybody like Eva, our neighbor's little girl? She is just a dear little thing, and isn't she like the rest of us, and isn't often at school, and yet everybody likes her. How's that?" "Why," said her father, "look at that lamp; it is a very frail thing, and doesn't make any noise, yet it makes this room very bright and pleasant, does it not? The lamp gives light, and little Eva gives love; and that is why people love her." She was always ministering before the Lord, for they who love do always that. Won't you try, each of you, to be one of God's little ministers?

Fault-Finding.

Fault-finding is an art that is easily learnt. All you have to do is to find out some little thing that is wrong, and then think about that, and keep your eyes always upon that, and by-and-by you won't be able to see anything but that! You know there are black specks on the face of the sun? Well, some people are greatly interested in these specks, for they can tell us very much about the weather—about cold seasons, wet seasons, storms, and the like.

Once, when a new speck appeared on the face of the sun, a gentleman called one evening upon an astronomer, who had been all day studying that speck through his telescope.

"What a fine day we have had!" said the visitor; "I have seldom seen the sun so bright." The astronomer looked puzzled for a minute, and then gave a hearty laugh. "Do you know," he said, "though I have been looking at the sun all day, I never noticed whether it was bright or not? I was so interested in that new speck which has appeared, that I didn't see anything else; and, really, until you spoke, my idea of the sun had been that it was rather dark!" That is the way fault-finders get so much to do: they see something or other that is not just right, and they go on thinking about that, and speaking about that, till they cannot see anything else; yet the fault they notice may be only a speck in the midst of a great deal of brightness. Try to discover the brightness that is in people, and then you will scarcely notice the specks.

A New Home Game.

At a recent children's party in England, a new amusement, called "The Spider at Home," was greatly enjoyed. On the arrival of the guests they were shown into a room where an immense cloth spider had apparently spun a large web all across the room. From numerous nails and projections were webs and mazes of white cotton threads, each attached at one end to a large, brightly-colored cloth spider or beetle, or some such insect, at the other end of which hung a little wooden winder. Each child in turn chose one of the latter, and winding up the thread followed all of its intricacies until a particular insect was reached, inside of which was found a small present. Some of our juvenile readers might find this a novel and amusing game for a winter evening.

Hiding Each Other's Faults.

Have you never seen women veil defects? writes Mrs. Margaret Bottom. I have. Oh, they know how to do it, with smiles and sweet words, and telling of all that was lovely in someone, and idealizing at that. You could only see the flowers they planted, and yet the ugly stump was there—but "charity covereth." The most dreadful thing in a family is the calling of your attention to some fault or other in some member of the household. I have seen husbands do it, speak of the fault of a wife, and have seen the wife try to cover the mistake of the husband in so doing. Oh, it is so pitiful. I wish young husbands and wives would not act as if there were no need of cultivating what they have. Even love is a talent which can only grow and increase, as we take pains to nurture it!

A Royal Sabbath-keeper.

It is related of Queen Victoria—who is a strict observer of the Sabbath, and who lays aside all secular duties on that day—that one of her Cabinet ministers arrived one night at Windsor Castle on a Saturday with important matter. These, he said, he would not ask her to look over that night, but on the morrow. "To-morrow is Sunday, my lord," "True, your majesty, but the business of the state will not admit of delay." The next morning the queen and her court went to church as usual.

The queen had asked the clergyman to preach on "The Christian Sabbath: its Duties and Obligations." At night Victoria said: "To-morrow morning, my lord, at any hour you please—as early as seven, if you like—we will look into those papers." "I could not think of intruding upon your majesty at so early an hour," said the minister; "nine o'clock will be quite soon enough." Here is a lesson for thoughtless parents to impress upon their children.

P. P. P. P. of Four Ps.

Each of us has to what you say,
Each of us has to how you say it,
Each of us has to how you say it,
Each of us has to how you say it.

If we will cultivate and always entertain pure thoughts with good will towards all, we cannot help being pleasant, prudent, and particular in all we say and do which helps to make great happiness.

On Guard.

YOU have a little prisoner,
He's nimble, sharp, and clever,
He's sure to get away from you,
Unless you watch him ever.
And when he once gets out he makes
More trouble in an hour,
Than you can stop in many a day,
Working with all your power.
He sets your playmates by the ears.
He says what isn't so,
And uses many ugly words
Not good for you to know.
Quick, fasten tight the ivory gates,
And chain him while he's young!
For this same dangerous prisoner
Is just—your little tongue!

PRISCILLA LEONARD

A BIRTH-DAY PRAYER MEETING.

A reader of this journal, Miss Isabe Withers, sends the following excellent suggestion as the result of personal experience. Select a number of bosom friends, write each one, giving the day of the month which your birthday comes, and ask each to be much in prayer for you on that day; and if possible, ere the day closes, or soon as they can, write a word to you being upon that subject; not a good, friendly letter, but just a word or two upon the subject of prayer, or quoting some of God's precious promises, and mail it to you, you may in that way more fully realize they were with you in a very tender manner upon that particular day. Your friend may be scattered many miles apart, but that day you will feel they are all with you in a glorious all-day prayer-meeting. None but God can count the value of. Then, as soon as you receive that written by your friends on the day of the all-day prayer-meeting, you will so gladly in answer write them something of the glorious times you had on that day. As each friend's birthday comes in turn, you will be with them in an all-day prayer-meeting. Try this once, and you will be eager for the birthday prayer-meetings as they come in turn.

A Foolish Sacrifice.

In the homes of Hindus, the ladies of the household never expose their faces save to the members of the family. Indeed, so strict is the observance of castelines and native custom in this respect that the high-bred Hindu woman would rather die than violate any of these inflexible laws. A Calcutta journal publishes the following incident which illustrates a remarkable degree this strict caste observance: "Some months ago the home of a wealthy Hindu family was on fire. There were nine pardah (zenana) ladies in the house, all of whom resolved to meet their fate in the flames rather than expose themselves to the crowd which surrounded the building. Six of them perished, and the other three were dragged out by force, terribly burned." The character of a religious and social system which holds human life so cheap naturally shocks the feeling of Christian communities, whose wives and daughters are far too precious and dearly loved to be imperiled, even in the slightest degree, for the sake of an absurd custom.

Rebuked by a Child.

It has frequently happened that a child has been the instrument for the salvation of its parents. A Christian pastor told this incident: "The parents of a certain little lad were not Christians. They were respectable, however, and his mother taught him the Lord's prayer. She also taught him an appropriate little verse as he retired for the night. Then the boy would repeat after his mother: 'G bless papa, mama, and Willie and me a good boy.' One evening as he was kissing his mother good night, he looked up into her face and said: 'Do you pray, mama?' 'No, darling,' 'Does papa pray?' 'I never heard him.' 'Why do you pray, mama?' 'That you may be good.' 'Do you want to be good, mama?' 'Oh, yes.' 'Then why don't you pray, and papa pray?' 'We've gotten out of the spirit, guess.' 'Well, mama, maybe God will hear my prayer. But don't you think you and papa want too much of a little fellow like me to do all the praying?' You might help me a little.' These words sank deep into the mother's heart, and it was not long before that house was a house of prayer and of blessing."

M. J. F., Ark. That a dear friend, now a backslider, who has strayed from the fold of Christ, might return to the Saviour seeking forgiveness, and might find pardon and peace. Also for a better understanding of God's ways in answering prayer.

M. C. L., Baltimore, Md. For more grace, that evil thoughts and suggestions may no longer find a place in my heart, that I may have full assurance of my acceptance with Christ, and that the doubts which now torture me may no longer distress me.

"One in Trouble," Wilmington, Del. That he who has promised to make darkness light and crooked things straight, will open the eyes of one who is being deceived, that he may see that things are not as they are represented to him, and that a severed friendship may be renewed.

"In His Name," Illinois. That God's blessing might rest on a family in need of his help. That the young parents might have the grace they need to train their children for God; also that unselfish and kindly, charitable thoughts of others might become the characteristics of the family.

N. R., Julian, Pa. That God would touch her husband's heart, wherever he may be, and cause him to return to the home he left three months ago; that the home and the three little children, once so happy, but now so desolate, might again become joyous and united in Christ.

"Despairing One," Williamsburg, N. Y. For grace to resist the temptations of one dearly beloved, whose sophistries it is hard to overcome in his presence. When the struggle is past I thank God for victory, but I fear that some day I may be entreating his pardon for awful wrong, or worse still, so lost to hope, as to feel it is no use asking pardon. Pray that he who is able to keep us from falling, may keep me.

H. M., Wetona, Pa. That God in his infinite mercy would look on an afflicted family. The father sick for three years past; the mother now prostrated with a malady which precludes her working any longer; four young helpless children wholly dependent on them for support; poverty becoming more pressing every day, as the small savings are exhausted. Both father and mother are Christians, and are looking to God for help in their sore affliction.

"Tried Believer," Hoboken, N. J. That in some way I may be enabled to earn enough to support myself honestly. My wages earned in an office in New York cover only my fares and board, and I have nothing left for clothes. The other girls dress well, and I am so shabby I am afraid I shall be discharged. I need help, oh, so badly, and the only help offered me is the price of sin. Pray for me, that I may be true to God and to the memory of my dead mother, who assured me when she was dying that God would care for her orphan child.

The Right Prayer.

At the recent centenary of the London Missionary Society, Dr. Lindsay of the Free Church said: he "was often discouraged at missionary meetings by hearing prayers offered for the opening of doors—when during the last thirty years no less than seven hundred million people, formerly inaccessible to the Gospel, had been made accessible—and by the prayer for laborers, when the Volunteer Student movement had provided the workers. These were, therefore, not prayers. Prayer was asking for what you have not got and want to get. What, then, is the real honest prayer for 1896? 'O, Lord, open my purse.' That is what you are wanting; what you have not got."

Wonders of the Antarctic.

Herr Borchgrevink, the explorer, anticipates great discoveries on his next visit to the Antarctic Continent. He found there, he says, signs of vegetation and of animal life, and he thinks it not improbable that a new human race akin, if akin be anything, to the people of Greenland may there be found. The seals which he discovered in the waters showed a certain timidity, which he attributed to the fact that they were attacked or preyed upon by other animals, this idea being further borne out by the wounds they carried on their bodies. Herr Borchgrevink declares that he can perform the task which has hitherto baffled all other explorers. He is ready to investigate the Antarctic Continent, and with the aid of snowshoes will try to reach the south magnetic pole.

All Is Well!

AS the days are swiftly passing
And we pause to backward look,
We can read on memory's pages
Clearly as on any book:
Many are the joys recorded,
Sorrow deep they often tell,
But above them hear the Master's Tender accents—"All is well."

When our lives were sad and dreary,
And the rain was falling fast,
When our hearts with grief were laden,
Bending low beneath the blast,
How that gentle voice still soothed us,
We would e'er the story tell,
Of the Saviour who has led us,
And has taught us "All is well."

What a King and what a Saviour!
He who came in lowly birth
To redeem poor fallen sinners,
And to heal the wounds of earth!
Shout with gladness, sing his praises;
Louder let the anthem swell:
Jesus came, and Jesus saves us,
"All is well!" yes, "All is well!"

IN HIS HANDS

A NEW SERIAL STORY,

WRITTEN EXPRESSLY
BY THE
REV. EDWARD AUGUSTUS RAND

CHAPTER V.

An Unhappy Conclusion.

THE Morton mansion was not Janet's home. This pretentious name belonged to the house where John Morton's father had lived and died, and where his mother was now living. It was a large, square, two-story house, sitting back in state. It was like the Mortons generally, not wanting to know everybody, but it stood as if wishing to be left alone to its big grass plot, to its wide carriage-way approaching it circuitously, to its outflanking rows of firs. It was that kind of a house suggesting great resources of comfort if occupied by a big family, filling its rooms, overflowing into its halls, echoing with laughter at its windows. It had now a lonely, forsaken look. Hardly a carriage disturbed by day the wide path bending round to its front door. By night from a side window in madame's chamber always gleamed a lamp. Such solitary lights sometimes make the outlying darkness more sensible from very contrast.

However, there was one part of the house that was thoroughly cheerful. That was the quarter where Paulina Davis presided. The kitchen below in a snug ell, and her chamber above, were set apart to the cultivation of a cheerful contentment. Paulina had a very vigorous personality and a happy one. She was energetic, tidy, and thrifty. She suited Madame Morton exactly, save on madame's despondent days, when she wanted to make everybody and everything gloomy as herself, but she could not bend Paulina to her will.

"No, I'm determined to be on the bright side of things, yes, bound," she would say, "and that settles it. When P'leen Davis's bound for to do a thing, what's to hinder?"

So she would shake her head, look out of her brown eyes in a very decided fashion, and start some cheerful tune. Then perhaps she would pull a curtain up to let in more sunshine, or perhaps lift a flower-pot to see if her "fav'rite geeranyum" had budded, or pull out the damper of the stove and set the fire to blithely murmuring. When all resources of occupation and diversion failed, she would pull out a half-completed braided mat from some receptacle and go to work on this. Paulina believed in mats manufactured of all kinds of bright woolen rugs.

Besides Paulina and the madame, Mrs. Blakey Chase might often be found in the old house. Whenever madame had an "ill turn," Mrs. Blakey would desert her spouse and come up to tend the old lady, for which Mrs. Blakey received a compensation. It was "nuts and raisins" to Paulina when madame had an ill turn, Paulina told Blakey, for then Mrs. Blakey would be in the silent old house and Paulina classed her as "real good company." Paulina's conscience sometimes reproached her because she viewed with complacency madame's likelihood to have an ill turn. If Paulina did come short of dutiful sentiment before these spasms of sickness began, she made up for it by the most faithful attentions to the old lady when sickness did set in. There was one other retainer of the family. This was Jed Davis' particular friend, Sandy Jones, but his work at the Morton mansion did not demand all his time, so he had a spare for fishing, and time for any adventure with Jed. But if Sandy did not always stay at the Morton mansion, there were some things he was sure to be there. If an "ill turn" was coming to madame, Sandy's tall, heavy form would be there, and that set Paulina's heart to fluttering.

My dear madame, I have been a few days, as unable to go to his mother as she was to come to him, when Paulina saw signs that madame was about to have an ill turn. She had taken madame's breakfast up to her room. It was still in shadow, for little of the light drapery of the curtains had been drawn. Madame was still in her bed.

"You — you — feel sicker?" asked Paulina, making out imperfectly a face on the pillow.

"Don't feel just easy," moaned a voice, old, worn, broken and querulous.

"Where?"

"I don't know."

Paulina went away in perplexity. She muttered to herself, "It is comin' on — suthin' — must be an ill turn."

General Paulina Davis concluded to call in her forces during the day. Sandy did not go to the fishing-grounds off South Ledge, but at once reported to Paulina for duty. In the midst of dinner Mrs. Blakey Chase was summoned.

"What is the matter, P'leen?" she solicitously inquired, bursting into the kitchen with its variegated floor.

"Don't know — suthin'! — she's not in pain, but dreadfully complainin'."

"Pain is a-comin', then. Have you sent for the doctor?"

"He is a-comin' — there, if he hasn't come! There's his kerridge out at the stable door now!"

Doctor Bent was a self-important old physician, with a cheerful, palavering way, rubbing his hands as he entered a room and patronizingly greeting all he met. He went into madame's room, but came out again in a little while. As he went out he told Paulina she had better send for Lawyer Skeele. Madame wanted to see him. "She has something on her mind," he said.

"Wants to make her will," whispered Mrs. Blakey to Paulina. "That's the suthin' on her mind."

Yes, something was on Madame Morton's mind, and it was not just the making of a will. The something had been there day after day, week after week, year after year. It had rubbed and galled, making a wound that asked for some kind of a doctor, but the right doctor had not been called in as yet. This sore place in her conscience Madame Morton was now resolved to poultice.

The "something" on Madame Morton's mind, the galling chain to be unwound and laid down, was this: Years ago, Nathan Morton and Judson Morton, Janet's father, the two brothers, had been connected in business — transactions out of which Nathan finally came much richer, and Judson was left a poor man. The responsibility and the work had been so divided that Judson went into the business arrangement loaded, but when it came to the sharing of profits, Nathan had the load on his back. Nathan had so adroitly managed everything that there was no legal obligation to give up half the profits, but the moral obligation was heavy and pressing. This moral obligation was neglected, and the two brothers were as estranged as if foreigners from opposite sides of the ocean. But conscience has its day of account settling. Nathan had been trying to get it far down out of sight and hearing, and stifle it, but when he was in his last sickness, conscience shook off all the heavy incumbrances piled upon it and rose up and confronted Nathan. The sick man could not bear it.

"Wife," he said feebly one day, "I have something to say to you. I don't think I have done just right by my brother Judson."

The wife knew this very well.

"Wife, I propose to leave my property to you — for John is not worthy of inheritance — and I will make you the executor of my will also. I want you to pay my brother ten thousand dollars. No need of specifying it in my will, for you will do it, and one time may be more convenient for you than another. You can manage it."

IN HIS HANDS.

Having made this gag for his conscience as smothered it once more, transferring his duty to his wife, he made his will, turned over in his bed, and died. And many days had gone by, weeks, months, years. Judson Morton had also turned over in his bed and died, the ten thousand dollars still withheld. For Nathan Morton had inserted into his request for his wife that word "convenient." She was expected to pay when convenient, at that convenient season had not come. Almost insane fear of coming to want he tormented her, but she now felt strengthened with the conviction that life's race had almost run out. She would then beyond all need of money. She had been at once discharge that long-delayed debt to the family of her brother. "Quick!" said conscience: and her reply in time was a question to another: "The lawyer come?" "Yes, I hear him and his clerk, Tobias Ames, out on the doorstep," replied Mrs. Blakey Chase.

Let them in!" squeaked the invalid. Through the hall and up the echoing stairway, bare of carpet, they slowly came. Judson Skeele, the lawyer, sat down to a little table occupied by ink, bottle and pens. His face was shaven, and this gave all the more prominence to his sharp, bony nose.

Madame was bolstered up in bed. Old as, though old enough to bring thin, white hairs and many wrinkles, could not destroy the evidence that in her younger days she must have been a handsome woman. Some of the former energy of her nature was used for the discharge of this duty, today, and the eyes flashed with something of the old brilliancy.

We will begin: 'I, Mary Ann Morton, big of sound mind and in the full possession of my faculties,' and so on," said the lawyer, scribbling away; "Be all ready for you in a moment, madame; just stating this. Now, madame, we are ready for the first thing. 'I give and bequeath to—' who and what?"

Madame's eyes brightened as she looked out of the window upon the first that looked like the house.

Well, squire, we think this piece of property is worth about ten thousand dollars, and I shall give it and five thousand dollars besides to the daughter of Judson Sele Morton. That is Janet, but I want you to put it 'the daughter of Judson—Sele—Morton.'

"This style of phraseology, it seemed me like giving to the dead man, Judson Sele Morton, and thus making amends for past neglect. Conscience felt easier in that moment this poultice was put upon it. Bides there had been no confession of a wrong done by Nathan Morton. This was a sop to the voracious Morton pride.

There had been a pause in the old lady's weak voice in giving the name. "The daughter of Judson Skeele," she had said, and in a moment added "Morton." The pause had only been momentary, but it was long enough for Lawyer Skeele to think that it was his own daughter that he meant. The added word "Morton" deceived him.

"I wish my name was Judson Skeele all something more," he thought, and his long gray hairs above his writing pen. He had often wished he were a Morton. Judson Skeele was his grandfather, and quite a distinguished man. Judson Skeele Morton took part of his name from the old celebrity, and it was not a reminder to Judson Skeele that one who would have made him the person in the will. The lawyer was writing "heirs and assigns," when he suddenly stopped and exclaimed, "But you have named your son, John; may be you don't mean to?"

Well, I shall get to him, squire. I am going to give him ten thousand dollars, too. You may begin."

As she was determined to do justice by the once disinherited John.

"I give and bequeath to John Morton, my son, his heirs and assigns—" rattled off the lawyer—"ten thousand, did you say? Hope he will keep steady and not squander it."

Ten thousand, squire."

There was now no noise heard in the room save the scratching of the lawyer's pen, and the old lady in silence continued her glance out of the window.

Now what else, madame?"

Several small legacies were here mentioned, and among them was a gift to Paulina Davis.

"The balance, squire, the balance of my property I divide between John Morton and Janet."

"I shall make you my executor, squire."

"Ah—oh!" said the squire, in tones of exquisite satisfaction. Some of those golden plums, then—all, indeed, would pass through his hands. They were hands, so people said—and people will talk foolishly at times, it is true—that were rather sticky. What if any of the Morton plums going through those hands should stick by the way?

"Ready for witnesses, squire?"

"Yes, madame—but hold on!"

"What is the matter?"

"Oh, just a word! I will read it to you in a moment."

He had left out one word. It was a very important word. It was the word Morton. "Daughter of Judson Skeele," said the clause in the will, as he had written it, giving house and money to Janet. "Skeele" came at the end of the line, and the squire had forgotten to begin the next line with that important word Morton.

"Quite an omission!" he said to himself, smiling. "Lavinia came pretty near getting a nice piece of property."

He took out his penknife, snipped off a narrow strip of paper, and wrote down the word "Morton."

"Anything to stick this on with, madame?"

"What, squire?"

"Any mucilage?"

"On that shelf back of the stove."

"Oh, yes; I see!"

He pasted the slip on to the under side of the sheet of paper containing the will, so that the word Morton projected beyond the margin and adjoined Judson Skeele.

"There!" he exclaimed, "All right now. Shall I read it to you before you sign it?"

"Let me look on while you read. Just hand me my spectacles, please, from the shelf where the ink bottle was."

The lawyer brought the spectacles. The old lady adjusted them promptly and energetically to her nose, and looked down on the document as he began to read.

"What's that stuck on there for?" said the old lady, noticing the slip attached to the margin.

"Oh, that's to get the name on, madame. Wasn't room for it."

"'Twould make quite a difference if the word Morton didn't stay there!"

"You are sharpening your wits more and more—ha, ha! They always said you were an extra hand for business, madame."

She did not seem to be suspicious, and told him to read on. When the document had been read, she said, "Now, I'll sign. I want three witnesses."

"I told you that you were a master-hand for business. I see that you understand."

"And the law says it means of disinterested witnesses," remarked madame, as if anxious to prove that she did have a good measure of business-knowledge.

"I see, I see! You would make an excellent attorney. Now I will call in Tobias, my clerk."

"Get my man Sandy and Blakey Chase's wife."

"I will, madame."

He did not wish for either of these, and was going to suggest two neighbors. He very well knew that Sandy and Blakey's spouse disliked him, and he did not like to have them. However, he brought them in.

The document was duly signed and sealed, and then the lawyer wrote down, "Signed and sealed by the above named Mary Ann Morton in our presence and declared by her to be her last will and testament and witnessed by us at her request."

Tobias promptly attached his name, then Sandy added his scrawl, while Mrs. Blakey Chase modestly brought up the rear with an imitation of a pine bough fence.

"There, the witnesses can be excused," said the lawyer. Two of these noticed that the word "Morton" projected beyond the margin of the will. Two of them read the word "Judson Skeele Morton." These were Sandy and Tobias. The lawyer folded up the document and bore it away.

"Now you've got through! Aint you glad," said Paulina busting into madame's room.

"Yes, yes," said madame gratefully. The poultice on her conscience was so agreeable.

"I think I will have a nap," said the old lady.

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily, Spurgeon.

Evils of the Drink Traffic.

Ex-Senator Blair Describes the Causes of the Failure of Prohibitory Legislation.

NO one can doubt that there is relatively less of prohibition sentiment and conviction in the country than there was fifteen years ago. Last week I was conversing with one of the ablest public men in this country, Hon. Wm. P. Hepburn, upon this subject. He said his judgment coincided with the above statement, and further observed that he had given many of the best years of his life to the advocacy of the prohibition of the liquor traffic in Iowa, that they had succeeded for a long time in its substantial suppression in the country towns, but it had proved to be irrepressible in the cities, and that gradually public opinion had been changing in the direction of regulation where formerly the sentiment for prohibition was almost universal, so that now it is very difficult for a political party to maintain a prohibitory law in New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, and other States that have tried and abandoned state prohibition retaining at most only the local option idea. This partial failure of state prohibition in practice after the struggles of two generations indicates either that the theory is wrong or that there is some great fault in its application, or that the people themselves are wrong. Perhaps both the latter suppositions are true, wholly or partially.

The fundamental truth upon which prohibition is founded is that alcohol is a poison, and therefore of necessity always injurious to the human organization when in health—good for it never except by reason of disease and as a medicine. Manifestly if this be not so, government, that is society, has no right to prohibit its sale any more than other innocent drinks, nor the general traffic in the commodity at the will of the parties interested. Society may regulate the traffic in a good thing in such ways as to prevent public or private injury, but if it be a good thing for the system in health there can be no more right to prohibit the sale of alcohol than of water or of bread, both of which may be hurtful if taken in excess. I believe that the true line of discrimination between the right to regulate or to prohibit a traffic wholly or partially is right here. It is the right of society to prohibit injury to the human being in both cases, that injury being occasioned by the abuse of a good thing in one case and in the other by a thing always bad in the healthy system. Thus regulation and prohibition are in one sense the same thing; that is, they are both different or comparative degrees of prohibition, and prohibitory laws so-called positively forbid the traffic where the article to be used is poison as alcohol always is when taken in the healthy system, while at the same time permitting its remedial use as is the case with strychnine, arsenic, prussic acid and other poisonous substances.

Prohibition is therefore after all but the regulation of the use of a poison, and when properly analyzed we see that it is but the application to alcohol of the same laws which are universally acquiesced in as to poisons in general. If the use of alcohol did not produce such an irresistible appetite there would be the same demand for the prohibition of its manufacture and sale as for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of any other deadly poison in the human system, that there is for the prohibition of the unrestricted traffic in arsenic.

One who has not specially inquired would hardly believe the extent to which the church and the clergy even are opposed to prohibitory laws. One competent and observant writes me that most of the ministers and ninety per cent. of the church members in his observation are opposed to prohibition. Prohibition prevails in spots, but although this statement may be too strong for the whole country, yet I am satisfied that a large majority of the clergy and a still larger majority of the male church members are secretly if not openly against prohibition.

But it is no doubt the desire of the great mass of the better members of society in and out of the churches, to see the evils of intemperance destroyed by law and by the abstinence of individuals.

Why then are they against prohibition and why does the temperance reform so halt and languish?

I think it is because of the general and lamentable failure of prohibitory state laws,—not of prohibition itself, but of an inefficient method of attempted prohibition which does not permanently prohibit at all. The great body of the best people in the nation are disgusted and discouraged with the perpetual ultimate failure of the most strenuous and prolonged efforts to suppress or much lessen the sale, under any form whatever of mere state regulation or of state prohibition. No state law can seriously affect the manufacture, for that can be carried on anywhere out of the jurisdiction of the law as well as within it, and the nation practically controls interstate and foreign commerce. That cannot be sold which is not made. No state law can long greatly interfere with the sale because the intensity of an appetite already existing, will contrive to get satisfaction somehow and somewhere. After a while the most vigorous efforts to enforce prohibition or even stringent license laws are seen to be hopeless; the most zealous and conscientious tire out, and the enemy comes in again like a flood. There is no hope but in national and international Prohibition and that with a large P.—What are we going to do about it?

New Discovery for Kidneys and Bladder

A Thread from God's Carpet.

Lessons Suggested for Daily Life in the Home and the World by the Grass.

BY REV. A. S. GUMBART.

THE things which are the most common are frequently the most wonderful. How often we tread the beautiful carpet with which our heavenly Father has adorned the earth, without thinking how wonderful it all is. As there are many different threads or color or design in the carpets in our homes, so there are many different kinds of grasses which compose the threads in God's carpet. When we speak of grasses we usually have in mind only the grass which constitutes our lawns; but there are between two and the hundred different kinds of grasses, each kind with a name of its own. Some of our young friends may be surprised when I tell them that the corn we eat is not the fruit of a mammoth grass. Now let us see what lessons we may learn from the grass:

We may learn of the goodness of God in caring for us. The various grasses constitute the great share of the world's food supply. The bread and the cake we eat, and many of the puddings, are made from grass seeds. When we speak of grain or corn, barley or corn, we refer to different kinds of grasses. It is God who made the seed and causes the grass to grow by which man and beast are fed. This does not simply happen, it is a strong proof that God watches over us and cares for us. And surely, if God so loves us and cares for us, we should love him and strive to please him; and when we pray: "Give us this day our daily bread," we should appreciate how much it all means. And this too, should give us faith to trust God and to know that he will provide for us. You remember, perhaps, that on one occasion the Saviour, calling attention to the beautiful flowers which grew in the fields, said: "If then God so clothe the grass, which is to-day in the field, and to-morrow is cast into the oven; how much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith?" Just as fathers and mothers desire their children to love them and to trust them, so our heavenly Father is pleased when we love him and trust him.

The grass reminds us that we should be good to the poor. God makes the grass to grow for the poor man as well as for the rich. Your New Testament teaches you that good Jesus was to the poor. If we desire to please Jesus and to be like him we too, must be good to the poor. No one is friend of Jesus who does not care whether other people are provided for or not. When God makes the grain and the seed to grow, he does not eat while others are starving; but he intends that every one of us shall have a part in distributing his bounty to the needy. A person with whom I am acquainted, learning of poor family in which there were seven children, purchased some groceries and took them to the place where these poor people lived. As he put them on the table the little children were so dreadfully hungry that with a heart-rending eagerness they grabbed hand fulls of raw oat meal and devoured it with satisfaction. Did you not think that this person's dinner tasted much better because he had been good to the poor? My heart aches when I think how many boys and girls go to bed hungry every night.

Again, we may learn from the grass that God loves beautiful things. The little flowers on the different kinds of grasses are exceedingly beautiful. Sometimes, however, they are so small that they cannot be seen except through a magnifying glass. And when we come to study the arrangement of the leaves and flowers on the stalks, and the various shades of green, and brown, and yellow, peculiar to grasses at different times of the spring, summer and autumn, we are impressed with the fact that God who is the author of all forms of beauty and color, is a beautiful loving God; and so we should try to please God by our beautiful lives. There is much beauty in this world, in earth, and sea and sky; but there is nothing so beautiful as a beautiful life. The most beautiful thing in the home is not the furniture, or pictures, or fresco, but the beautiful life: if the life is not beautiful nothing can make up for it. Our words and actions and thoughts should always be such as to make the home and the world more beautiful and bright.

Some grasses teach us lessons of warning. There is one kind of grass called "Catch Fly Grass," because the leaves open like a trap, lined with sharp spikes, and if a fly or an insect steps within to eat of the honey, it closes and the fly is doomed to die. All along the journey of life Satan sets traps for our boys and girls, and he is very cunning. His trap is concealed, and his bait very tempting. You may know that in trapping wild animals, a deep hole is sometimes dug and covered over very carefully with boughs and leaves, so as to leave the tempting bait in sight and at the same time to conceal the trap, with the result that in striving to secure the bait the animal falls into the trap. So Satan has all manner of devices, and because the trap is not always seen, boys and girls who scorn to take advice are caught.

Let me, in illustration of this fact, tell you a true story: A young lad took to smoking cigarettes. When advised to drop such a foolish habit, he only laughed. By and by he took to cigars. He received plenty of good advice, but he "saw no harm in it." Later he received a position as a collector, and one day wanting a cigar very much, he took enough of his employer's money to buy one. The habit of taking small sums of his employer's money grew upon him until he was discovered and discharged. He secured another place, but Satan was after him, and again he stole. This time he was discovered and put into prison. Oh, boys and girls, I could tell you many such sad stories.

Not long ago I visited a woman in prison who had been arrested for stealing; and it all began by taking small pieces of cloth that belonged to other people. Her mother was a dressmaker, and the little girl would take pieces that were cut off. The habit grew upon her, and now when she was a married woman, she was arrested for more serious offences. Another woman is now serving a life sentence for murder which all began by writing foolish letters to a strange man, with whom she became acquainted through an advertisement in a paper.

Look out young people for Satan's traps! When we lie because we have done something we should not have done, or steal because we wanted something that did not belong to us, or say angry words because things did not go to please us, we put ourselves in danger of being caught in one of Satan's traps. Sometimes a fly is caught because of no fault of its own; but so far as we are concerned, if we strive always to do God's will and yield ourselves to the Holy Spirit, there is no danger of our being caught in one of Satan's traps.

Christ Before Annas.*

THIS materialistic Sadducee was appointed high priest in A. D. 7, and held his office to A. D. 14, when he was deposed by the governor of Judea; hence at the time of the trial of Christ, Annas had been an ex-high priest for sixteen years. He succeeded in getting five of his sons and his son-in-law (Caiaphas) into the high office. These men officially filled the office of high priest, but Annas was the power behind the throne that governed matters at long range. He enjoyed all the honor of the office without assuming its responsibility or coming under its restraint. He was very wealthy, much of which came directly and indirectly from the sacred office. Dr. Farrar says: "It was the family of Annas who founded the four shops under the twin cedars of Olivet, in which were sold things legally pure, and which they had manipulated with such commercial cunning as to raise the price of doves to a gold coin apiece. . . . There is every reason to believe that the shops which had intruded even under the temple porticoes were not only sanctioned by their authority, but even managed for their profit. There were good reasons why Annas, the head representative of the Viper Brood (as the Talmudic author calls them), should strain to the utmost his cruel prerogative of power to crush a prophet whose actions tended to make him and his powerful family at once wholly contemptible and comparatively poor." Annas stood opposed to Jesus religiously, financially, socially, and politically.

Jesus is standing in the presence of Annas, guarded by Jewish officers. Annas questioned Jesus concerning his apostles in about the following manner: "Young prophet, how many apostles have you? What are their names? Where are they? Young prophet, I perceive that you have been teaching your followers secretly for months to proclaim you a king at this annual passover, which thing they assumed to do on last Monday as you rode into the city with the people, crying, 'Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord.'" This is a double statement with a double meaning. Annas' object in spying out Jesus' apostles was that he might have them arrested, and thus put an end to the powerful influence of Jesus at Jerusalem. Jesus purposely passed over the reference to his apostles, for he had decided to protect them at any cost to himself. As to his teaching, Jesus gravely replied: "I have taught no secret doctrine. All my teaching has been in the most public way. Why do you thus accuse me?" To those who were guarding Jesus his answer seemed to say: "Annas, your accusation against me is a lie."

FLORIDA.

Personally-Conducted Tours via Pennsylvania Railroad.

It would be hard to find any condition of human attainment that a Winter visit to Florida would fail to improve, while those who enjoy good health cannot realize, without experience, what true enjoyment there is in life passed under the golden skies of the "Land of Flowers."

In order to give the public an opportunity to visit Florida at a very reasonable cost, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has arranged for a series of tours to Jacksonville. Since the system of personally-conducted tours inaugurated by that company has been in effect, none but words of commendation have been received. Its unexcelled train service, experienced Tourist Agents and Chaperons, and above all, its moderate charges, leave nothing to be desired.

The tours to Jacksonville, allowing two weeks' stay in Florida, will leave New York and Philadelphia on February 25 and March 3, 1892. The rate, including transportation, meals en route, and Pullman berth on special train, is $50.00 from New York, and $45.00 from Philadelphia; proportionate rates from other points.

For further information apply to Ticket Agents, or address Tourist Agent, 195 Broadway, New York, or Room 411, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, to whom application for space should also be made.

THE LANDING PLACE AT THE SULTAN'S FAVORITE PALACE ON THE BOSPHORUS. See Page 163.

La Place says he saw one world in the northern hemisphere sixteen months burning. Tycho Brahe said he saw another world burning. A French astronomer says that in three hundred years fifteen hundred worlds have disappeared. Even the moon is a world in ruins. Stellar, lunar, solar catastrophes innumerable. But it seems as if the most sorrows have been reserved for our world. A mountain falls in Switzerland, burying the village of Goldau. A mountain falls in Italy in the night, when 2,000 people are asleep, and they never arouse. By a convulsion of the earth Japan broken off from China. By a convulsion of the earth the Caribbean Islands broke off from America. Three islands near the mouth of the Ganges, with 340,000 inhabitants — a great surge of the sea breaks over them and 214,000 perish that day. Ah, alas, for our poor world! It has been recently discovered that a whole continent has sunk, a continent that connected Europe and America — part of the inhabitants of that continent going to Europe, part coming to America over the table-lands of Mexico, up through the valleys of the Mississippi, and we are finding now the remains of their mounds and their cities in Mexico, in Colorado and the table-lands of the West. It is a matter of demonstration that a whole continent has gone down, the Azores off the coast of Spain only the high mountain of that sunken continent. Ptolemy described that continent, its grandeur, the multitude of its inhabitants, its splendor and its awful destruction, and the world thought it was a romance, but archaeologists have found out it was history, and the English and the German and the American fleets have gone forth with archaeologists, and the Challenger and the Dohrn and the Gazelle have dropped anchor, and in deep sea soundings they have found the contour of that sunken continent. And there is trouble marked on the rocks, on the sky, on the sea, on the flora and the fauna. Astronomical trouble, geological trouble, oceanic trouble, political trouble, domestic trouble, and standing in the presence of all those stupendous devastations, I ask if I am not right in saying that the great want of this age and all ages is divine sympathy and omnipotent comfort, and they are found not in the Brahma of the Hindoo, or the Allah of the Mohammedan, but in the Christ unto whom shall the gathering of the people be. Other worlds may fall, but this morning shall will never be blotted from the heavens. The earth may quake, but this Rock of Ages will never be shaken from its foundations. The same Christ who fed the 5,000 will feed all the world's hunger. The same Christ who cured Bartimeus will illumine all blindness. The same Christ who made the dumb speak will put on every tongue a language. The same Christ who awoke Lazarus from the sarcophagus will yet rally all the pious dead in glorious resurrection. "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and that "to him shall the gathering of the people be." At my friends, when Christ starts forth and quickly to lift this miserable wreck of a sunken world, it will not take him long to lift it.

I have thought that this particular age in which we live may be given up to discoveries and inventions by which through quick and instantaneous communication all cities and all communities and all lands will be brought together, and then in another period, perhaps, these inventions which have been used for worldly purposes will be brought out for Gospel invention, and some great prophet of the Lord will come and snatch the mysterious, sublime and miraculous telephone from the hand of commerce, and all lands and kingdoms connected by a wondrous wire, the prophet of the Lord may, through telephonic communication, in an instant announce to all nations pardon and sympathy and life through Jesus Christ, and then, putting the wondrous tube to the ear of the Lord's prophet, the response will come back: "I believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, his only begotten Son." You and I may not live to see the day. I think those of us who are over forty years of age can scarcely expect to see the day. I expect before that time all bodies will be sound asleep in the hammocks of the old Gospel ship as it sails on. But Christ will wake us up in time to see the achievement. We who have sweated in the hot harvest-fields will be at the door of the garner when the sheaves come in. That work for which in this world we toiled and wept, and struggled and wore ourselves out shall not come to consummation and we be oblivious of the achievement. We will be allowed to come out and shake hands with the victors. We who fought in the earlier battles will have just as much right to rejoice as those who reddened their feet in the last Armageddon. Ah! yea, those who could only give a cupful of cold water in the name of a disciple, those who could only scrape a handful of lint for a wounded soldier, those who could only administer to old age in its decrepitude, those who could only coax a poor waif of the street to go back home to her God, those who could only lift a little child into the arms of Christ, will have as much right to take part in the ovation to the Lord Jesus Christ as a Chrysostom. It will be your victory and mine, as well as Christ's. He the conqueror, we shouting in his train, Christ the victor will pick out the humblest of his disciples in the crowd, and turning half around on the white horse of victory he shall point her out for approval by the multitude as he says: "She did what she could." Then putting his hand on the head of some man, who by his industry made one talent do the work of ten, he will say: "Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over ten cities." Two different theories about the fulfilment of this promise.

THE SULTAN'S PALACE OF DOLMA-BAGTCHE, CONSTANTINOPLE.

There are people who think Christ will come in person and sit on a throne. Perhaps he may. I should like to see the scarred feet going up the stairs of a palace in which all the glories of the Alhambra, and the Taj Mahal, and the St. Mark's, and the Winter Palace are gathered. I should like to see the world pay Christ in love for what it did to him in maltreatment. I should like to be one of the grooms of the chargers, holding the stirrup as the King mounts. Garlands of all nations on his brow — of the bronzed nations of the South and the pallid nations of the North — Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America, and the other continents that may arise meantime from the sea, to take the places of their sunken predecessors; Arch of Trajan, Arch of Titus, Arch of Triumph in the Champs Elysees, all too poor to welcome this King of kings, and Lord of lords, and Conqueror of conquerors in his august arrival. Turn out all heaven to meet him. Hang all along the route the flags of earthly dominion, whether decorated with crescent, or star, or eagle, or lion, or coronet. Hang out heaven's brightest banner, with its one star of Bethlehem and blood-striped of the Cross. I hear the procession now. Hark! the tramp of the feet, the rumbling of the wheels, the clattering of the hoofs, and the shout of the riders. Ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands. The old promise struggling through the ages fulfilled at last: "Unto him shall the gathering of the people be."

While everlasting ages roll,
Eternal love shall feast their soul,
And scenes of bliss for ever new,
Rise in succession to their view.

In the Sultan's Palace.

The Abode of Abdul Hamid, Sultan of Turkey — The Personal Character and Habits of the Ottoman Potentate.

PROBABLY no building in all Europe has so many associations with tragic events as that of which pictures are given on this and on the first page. It is the palace of the Sultan of Turkey, the autocrat whose rule is absolute over more than thirty million subjects. From this palace go forth the edicts which involve the death of thousands and which control the governments of distant provinces. Fifty years ago the Sultans governed a huge territory in Europe, but one province after another has been freed from their yoke, until Turkey in Europe has dwindled in size to less than half its former area. But the Asiatic possessions of the Sultan have not diminished and the events in Armenia which have recently horrified the whole world, show what that possession means. Nor are these massacres a new or unparalleled feature of Turkish rule. Similar horrors have been perpetrated before under the cognisance of the Sultans and the only reason why the indignation now aroused on the subject is deeper and more intense, is that it is now impossible to conceal them and in the days of the telegraph and cheap newspapers they are set in the light of publicity. The Turk is no worse now than he has always been, and is only trying to govern at the end of the nineteenth century as he gov-ambassadors or presides at the Council of State. He dines at sunset, and usually alone, after which he resumes the examination of State papers, confers with the Pashas of highest rank and transacts the most urgent business. If he can snatch an hour of rest after his toil is completed, he spends it in the private apartments with the women and children, listening to music, or himself performing on the piano. The palace in which he thus spends his time day after day is described as occupying one of the most lovely sites in Europe. Charming views are commanded from its windows, and the park, well wooded, stretches down in grassy slopes to the Bosphorus. The park is nearly three miles in extent, and within it are the offices of the Government Departments. It is the centre of intrigue, and summary punishment is often meted out to persons rightly or wrongly suspected of conspiracy. Dr. Henry M. Field, of New York, who visited the palace a few years ago, says that in one of the courts a fountain was pointed out to him where offenders were put to death privately. It was formerly the custom, from which the present Sultan was the first to depart, to put to death on the accession of a new Sultan any of his relatives who might be likely to conspire against him. Even babes have been strangled, if they had royal blood in their veins, lest when they grew up they should become the centre of plots of discontented persons who might wish to substitute them for the reigning Sultan.

An interesting story of the present Sultan is related by Mr. W. T. Stead, in an article in his Review of Reviews, which in some measure explains the singular mixture in his character of fanaticism, such as that which produced the Armenian massacres, with the marked ability and intelligence he displays in the conduct of national affairs. It appears that when he was a mere youth, he was conspicuous even in Constantinople which is notorious for its immorality, for the gross excesses of his private life. There was then little probability of his ever ascending the throne and as he was condemned by his position to a life of idleness, he plunged into all the wickedness of the capital and lived a life of debauchery. Suddenly and without any cause that has ever been explained, he changed his course. He quitted his evil ways and became a devout follower of Mohammed, was attentive at the mosque and gave all his thoughts to his religion. From that time until now his religious enthusiasm has been the most prominent feature of his character. But with the change came a fierce intolerance, a desire that others should follow his example and a determination, evinced since his accession, that in his own dominions no enemy of the prophet, nor any who did not avow themselves his followers, should have peace or rest until they accepted the faith. This spirit accounts for the crusade against the Armenians whom he hates because they are Christians.

True Love to One's Neighbor.

Sunday School Lesson for March 8. Luke 10: 25-37. Golden Text, Luke 10: 27. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

TRUE love to one's neighbor is like love to God; it is not indigenous, it is the growth of another clime. The flesh, our poor, fallen, human nature cannot produce it; it is a thing of eternity; it has its beginning, and its never-ending, in him who is Love—the eternal God. It has all the characteristics of that wonderful picture of love in I. Cor. 13, and is as far above and beyond the conceptions of men as God himself, in his infinity, is beyond the finite creatures which he has made.

"A certain lawyer stood up and tempted" Jesus! A Jewish lawyer of the time of Christ was a man versed in the law of Moses, the Holy Scripture of the day. The lawyers were the scribes, they had the transcription of the Scriptures as well as the administration of the law. Why should such an one tempt, or test, Jesus? It was the natural enmity which arises in the heart of one who knows what is right, and does it not, against others who do in their lives what he only teaches as a doctrine. Fortified, as he thought, in his Scripture knowledge, this man reckoned himself more than a match for Jesus. He came to him, and accosted him in his character of Teacher, saying:

What Shall I do to inherit eternal life? What shall I do? is always the question of the natural man. In every language and in every clime, men whether heathen, Mohammedan, Jewish, or professedly Christian, ask the same question—"What shall I do?" implying their belief that they can, at least, do something. The Lord Jesus, in every difficult moment, whether in encountering the devil or man, fell back upon the Word of God. What is written in the law? How readest thou? The lawyer was at no loss in any point of doctrine: without a moment's hesitation, he quoted the Divine epitome of the law from Deut. 6: 5; Lev. 19: 18. Thus he answered one question, the first; but left entirely unanswered the second, searching query, "How readest thou?" And yet the answer to this question involved the answer to his own. The lawyer's question implied that he had not come, as teacher to teacher, to discuss a point which was outside of himself: he did not say, What is to be done to inherit eternal life? but, What shall I do? and there was no impropriety in the question of our Lord, Teacher, "how readest thou?"

Jesus replied to the lawyer by taking him on his own ground; doing, not receiving: "Thou hast answered right; this do, and thou shalt live." Again and again had these words been on the lips of this teacher of the law, but never before had he quoted them in the presence of the one whose life fulfilled them to the letter. The lawyer's question implied that he had not come, as teacher to teacher, to discuss a point which was outside of himself: he did not say, What is to be done to inherit eternal life? but, What shall I do? and there was no impropriety in the question of our Lord, Teacher, "how readest thou?"

Touched the Conscience

By the question, "how readest thou?" the lawyer was brought to a point where he was himself worsted by his own version of the law, turned against himself. He did not attempt to stand upon his doing in the matter of love to God, but thought he had some chance in the matter of love to man. He desired to justify himself, for his foundations were trembling under him; and he said, "But what is the law?" The law only a limit were fixed to his responsibility, he might do some little act of kindness here and there, appease his conscience, and so pass the standard. But he might have too many demands, the amount of love he possessed could easily be exhausted, and now that he was pressed into a corner by the intense reality of him whom he had attempted to attack, he must look well to his bearings.

And the Lord, in his wondrous wisdom, shed light upon the perplexed man by the illustration so well known as the parable of the Good Samaritan. But far from answering the expectation of the Jewish lawyer, and relieving his anxiety, it entirely reversed the view of things: he reviewed the persons who could institute a claim of neighborship upon him from the lofty heights of his supposed goodness, but the Lord's view of the case was quite another: it was to shew him that the duty he sought to shirk, was a privilege that he might well seek to possess. It was not who could claim to be his neighbor, but to whom could he prove, by his actions, that he was worthy to be neighbor. As long as we do anything in the spirit of patronage, we know nothing of the love which loves its neighbor as itself.

Christ does not Patronize.

He came down to our level that he might save us. Thus our Lord, in his little story of the traveler, who on the dangerous, robber-infested road between Jerusalem and Jericho, "fell among thieves," brings out in strongest contrast the representatives of the law and of the Gospel. The victim of the robbers lay wounded and half dead by the wayside; nothing was left to him but the little spark of life which was almost extinguished. "A certain priest" by chance came that way; the object of his journey was evidently not to seek after that which was lost, and so he did not reckon the wounded man, although he was a Jew, to be his neighbor; "he passed by on the other side;" he had the same heart as the lawyer; he knew the law, but when it came to the test, he did not do it, the letter was familiar to him, but the spirit utterly foreign. A Levite followed, and he, "when he was at the place, came and looked on him," but it was no matter of his, he thought. He was to love his neighbor as himself, but who could prove that this man was his neighbor? He had in his heart just as much of that law of love which he taught as the lawyer had; and when an opportunity presented itself for manifesting the love he taught about, "he passed by on the other side."

"But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed came where he was." The care for a needy stranger was evidently to him an admitted part of the journey which he undertook. The question, "Who is my neighbor?" had not occurred to him: he had no need to fence off from him those who could have made claims upon his benevolence. Living in sympathy with the heart of God, he trusted him to bring him in contact with those to whom he might be permitted to minister. Not being the steward of his own resources, he could not only draw upon them fully, mount the wounded stranger on his own ass, and himself walk on foot, but when he took him to an inn, he could depute the charge of him to the host, on the understanding that whatever it might cost him, he would be repaid. It was a picture of Jesus, but it was also a picture of the man in whom Jesus dwells, who is the End—the fulfilling of the law. This, then, is the love of the Gospel: loving as we have been loved.

And Jesus, having completed the story, put the pertinent question to the lawyer, "Which of these three thinkest thou, proved neighbor unto him that fell among the robbers?" (R. V.)? The convicted man came down from his pedestal of criticism: there was but one answer to give, and he gave it: "He that shewed mercy on him." But, beloved reader, do you and I prove ourselves "neighbor" to those around us, whom God places on our path? It is true many of us are besieged with habitual beggars, who trade on the generosity of Christians, and refuse to work for their living, and we are in great danger of becoming hardened in heart from the continual discovery of hypocrisy and deceit among them. But God permits this test to drive us closer into his heart, and to lead us to wait on him all the more closely, that we may learn of him which are those to whom he would have us prove ourselves neighbors in his name, and which of the utterly unworthy people, who injure themselves and others by their laziness and beggary, should be steadily refused, because God had said, "If any will not work, neither let him eat." (II. Thes. 3: 10, R. V.)

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AN INN NEAR JERICHO

had been allotted by Joshua to the tribe of Gad. On his way thither, Jesus had a practical experience of the hostility existing between the Jews and the Samaritans. The mere fact of his being on his way to Judæa, was sufficient to arouse antipathy. He was refused even ordinary hospitality, and was treated so discourteously, that the disciples wanted to call down fire from heaven to burn the offenders. The Samaritans were despised and loathed by the Jews, and the Jews were hated by the Samaritans. That fact gives increased interest to the parable of this week's lesson. The occasion of its delivery was a question proposed by one of the lawyers of the time, as a test of Christ's orthodoxy. Christ knew that the lawyer was not seeking enlightenment, so he causes him to answer his own question by a quotation from the law. But the lawyer did not wish to appear in the light of a man laying a trap for the Teacher, and asked another question to show that his former one was justified. He wants to know how far this circle of neighborhood extended. Who is this neighbor whom he is to love as himself? What gives a man a title to the rights and claims of a neighbor? Christ answers by the parable, and he skillfully changes the standpoint of the questioner. The lawyer is invited to apply the question to himself and ask, "To whom am I willing to be a neighbor?" Jesus does not say that the robbed and wounded man was a neighbor to the priest, the Levite, or the Samaritan. The question was, Who was a neighbor to him? The difference is important. Here is a man in urgent need and three men know of it. To help him would involve trouble, expense and perhaps danger of being robbed by the same highwaymen who had maltreated the traveler. Two of the men pass by. They do not see that it is their duty to help him, he has no claim on them. Still less has he a claim on the third, who is a Samaritan. If, as we may infer from his coming from Jerusalem the wounded man was a Jew, he would when he was whole and well, reject any kindness proffered by the Samaritan. "The Jews have no dealing with the Samaritans." Well, in this case, the Samaritan might naturally decide to have no dealing with the Jew. But he is not a man of the kind. He uses his wine and oil, binds the man's wounds, puts him on his own beast and walks himself that the wounded man may ride, takes him to the inn and defrays the cost of his entertainment. He does more. He bids the inn-keeper take care of him and leaves two pence or dinar equal to thirty cents of our money, which at that time was the pay of a laborer for two days and so equivalent to three dollars in our day, with a promise to pay more if more is needed. That is the man whose example the lawyer is to follow. He is to be a neighborly man. Possibly the people whom he sees in need of help may be strangers, or enemies, they may have been imprudent, may have brought their misfortunes on themselves, it may be none of his concern whether they live or starve to death—we often hear such reasons given for withholding charity. Lord takes none of them into account. His command is, "Go thou and do likewise. His life and work are in unison with "While we were yet enemies Christ loved us and died for us."

What shall I do to inherit eternal life? A similar question was asked long ago in pagan Rome. "What sacrifice will be pleasing to the gods?" asked an earnest young man, addressing Hermes. The answer was, "No sacrifice will be so acceptable as yourself." The young man could not understand, so his teacher took him into scenes of misery and sin. He showed him the suffering and the wretchedness abounding, and said to him, "Give yourself to relieving that; take pains; these people to forsake evil; deny yourself to supply their needs. Devote your life that work. There is your altar; lay yourself upon it and be a sacrifice."

He had compassion on him. We may wait a long time now, for an opportunity of helping a man who had been robbed and half murdered, but we need not wait long for an opportunity of helping someone and so doing what Christ suggested when he told the story. "I was sitting by my window," writes a well known author, "one cold, slippery day. A group of boys were on the street under my window laughing loudly. They were watching people as they turned the corner opposite. I wondered what excited their merriment, but I understood when I saw that they were walking just there had been wet and frozen smooth. It was a treacherous place. People hurrying along in the icy air slipped the corner quickly, came unexpectedly on the smooth ice and lost their footing. One after another fell and each time the boys set up a laugh. Presently a girl came along with a basket. She slipped and fell, and out of her basket rolled a quantity of spoils of silk and cotton and a quantity of buttons, tapes and such things. She was in distress, her fingers were too cold and stiff to pick them up easily. The boys laughed but none offered to help. But the door of the house opposite opened and out ran a boy without his hat. He gathered up her little treasures quickly, put them in her basket and with a kind smile ran back into the house. That is the act, I said to myself, of a Christian gentleman. I loved that boy."

Go thou and do likewise. The late William M. Taylor used to relate an incident of his family history in illustration of this injunction. His grandfather was a farmer in a mountain district in Scotland. One day he was going to the mill with a sack of wheat which was thrown across his horse's back. The horse stumbled and the sack slipped off. The farmer tried in vain to put it back. It was too heavy for one man to lift. In the distance a man was approaching on horseback. Taylor waited for him to come up, intending to let him to help. But when the man came nearer it proved to be the Laird from the castle, much too great a man to be asked for such a service. But the Laird did not wait to be asked. He dismounted and helped to put the sack in its place. Taylor was profuse in his thanks. "Say no more," said his Lordship; "I will tell you how to pay for my service: Whenever you see a man needing a helping hand as badly as you did just now, go you to his assistance." So saying he rode away.

LIBERATING AFRICAN SLAVES.

T Dark Continent still Cursed with the Traffic in Flesh and Blood - A Movement to Emancipate and Educate the Slaves.

SLAVERY is not dead in Africa. Far from it: there are many parts of that great continent as sorely blighted by the black traffic in human beings as before the Brussels Treaty declared it to be.

The civilized powers, hold in colonial possessions in Africa, to secure the freedom of all who dwell within their respective territories or came under the protection of their flags.

Hundreds of African fathers and brothers amid burning homes, are to-day falling under the bullet or the sword of the slave; their children are being speared, young men and women are being chained and marched to the slave mart; hundreds of wretched men and women along the paths trodden by slave gangs are sinking under the load. Numbers are being daily sold by parents, by creditors, by judges, by victors; male and female slaves are used over a whole continent as regular currency, in some parts even fattened for cannibalistic feasts. It is true, war is being successfully waged at some points of the Congo State and in Natal against Arab raiders, by European officers; but over the whole Soudan and through all Central Africa, native slave-raiders continue their inhuman business unchecked. The trade in human flesh in such places is as thriving as ever.

The revelation of this state of things gave rise to the great anti-slavery movement inaugurated in 1888 by Lavigerie. It compelled all the civilized nations of the world, including European powers, and the United States, to meet in conference and take immediate measures for the repression of the heinous traffic and the gradual extinction of slavery itself.

The General Act of the Brussels Conference of 1889-90, ratified by the President of the United States on Jan. 19, 1892, and proclaimed to the world on April 2 of the same year, contains in one hundred articles the programme of the civilized nations for this anti-slavery campaign in Africa. It makes it binding on them to stop all slave-dealing operations; to liberate the victims; and after liberation, to care for them and educate abandoned boys and girls. For the humane work of healing the sick, feeding the starving, protecting the weak, teaching the helpless to help themselves, settling the strangers in new homes, educating these savage wards of Europe into civilized Christian citizens, the governments through the Brussels Act call for the assistance of benevolent societies. Such societies have already been organized in every leading country of Europe; not only in those which have political and commercial interests in Africa, but also in Switzerland, Austria and Scandinavia. While the poor do not withhold their pennies, the rich of their wealth, the great use their influence, the brave give their lives. One German society, it is stated, has 200,000 members. At the head of the anti-slavery Phil-African Leagues, we find in Germany: Prince Hohenlohe-Langenbourg, Count Arnim-Muskau, General von Stibberg, the Archbishop of Cologne; in Italy: Prince Rospigliosi; in Switzerland: Euard Naville, the Egyptologist; Gustave Moynier, founder and President of the Red Cross Society; Count St. George; in Belgium: Leopold II., the Count of Flanders, and the flower of the Belgian nobility, of the clergy, and the social, commercial and political worlds. In fact, the whole nation seem to have enlisted in the Anti-Slavery Society. The Belgium Society has already equipped at great cost four considerable military expeditions which have done good work in establishing order on the Tanganyika, and in protecting thousands of native settlers around the mission stations there. The Congo State has established and supports four colonies of young people who are being carefully trained for state service as artisans and also as soldiers. Although a volunteer could be filled with all the good already achieved by the existing societies, the aggregate receiving capacity of all missions is sadly inadequate.

Thus far, American Christians have not actively shared in the great crusade. A movement is now on foot, however, having for its object the formation of an American Phil-African Liberators' League for the purpose of liberating and educating native slaves in Africa. The movement has already met with such a warm approval in many quarters that it is now practically assured that the people of America will be able to take up their share of the work vigorously and successfully.

Mr. Heli Chatelain, who has had eleven years of African experience as a self-supporting missionary, as U. S. Commercial Agent, and as author on African philology and ethnology, has had abundant opportunity to study the system of African slavery and the workings of the slave-trade. Again and again gangs of slaves, ten, twenty, fifty, a hundred at a time, scarred and starved, have passed before his eyes. Some who had been cruelly kidnapped or unjustly sold, or were illegally detained, encouraged by a word of sympathy in their native tongue, appealed to him for redress. But he was powerless. With agony of soul, he had to turn away and try to forget. But the vision clung to him, and kept haunting him until he resolved to devote his entire energies to the amelioration of the condition of those wretched people. Under the Brussels Treaty, they are nominally free and entitled to all the blessings of freedom. But officials winked at the violation and he found that traders and planters of many nationalities were not loath to secure their labor through the slave-dealers who were always ready to bring slave caravans to the coast towns to supply the labor market. And this is the state of affairs to-day.

In 1890 Mr. Chatelain was returning to America from Loanda by the S. S. "Mozambique," of the Portuguese "Mala Real." Among his fellow-passengers were over one hundred so-called contract-laborers for the cocoa and coffee plantations of San Thome Island. One young man, of dark brown complexion, and tattooed all over his face and body, attracted my attention. Mr. Chatelain recognized in him a member of the Ba-shilange tribe, among whom his friend, Dr. Summers, had labored and died. A patient interrogatory revealed the following facts: The fine-looking young man was indeed a Mu-shilange from Mukenge, Kalamba's town, near Luluaburg. He had seen Summers and Wissmann and the other white men who visited his country. His name was Musulu (river). He, with the Ba-shilange, had accompanied some native traders of Kasanji (Cassange), to this place on the Kuango river. Here Musulu was taken ill and left in charge of Kambols ka Kitamba, a Cassange trader, with means to see him, saw his first chance of selling Musulu to a white trader of Malange, who in his turn sold him, through a coast-agent, to a planter of St. Thomas. It was a clear case of kidnapping. By the Brussels Act, that man should have been released and cared for.

But he knew not the white man's speech nor did these take the trouble to hunt up an interpreter to translate his story. If he became loud in his attempts to explain his case, a thrashing would soon silence the importunate talker. Finding a sympathizing ear in Mr. Chatelain, Musulu conceived new hopes of regaining his liberty. Mr. Chatelain tried repeatedly to redeem him, even at a high price. But all in vain. Had he been backed by a society his efforts would not have been fruitless.

A few months ago, a Portuguese official in Angola was accused by his own secretary and by the press of having sold six or eight natives, who had sought the protection of the Portuguese flag against those who wanted to kill them for superstitious motives. The officer was removed from his post, apparently to release the native victims from their bondage on the unhealthy plantation to which they were sold, or to grant them the protection of the flag which they had confidently implored. A Liberator's League could help the governments to carry out their own laws in such and similar cases.

The proposed Liberators' League, now being organized in the United States, will not be an aggressive organization in the sense in which that term may be applied to some European societies. It will not antagonize officials or governments, but, on the contrary, will work in sympathy with the authorities from whom it will receive the liberated slaves and, by colonization and industrial training, transform them into hard-working, thrifty Christians.

farmers, mechanics, and law-abiding citizens. While English, German, French, and Belgian cannot well undertake work in the colonies of other nations, owing to political rivalry, Swiss or American societies, as neutrals, are welcome in all parts of the Continent. Mr. Chatelain's personal connection with the African centres, at London, Brussels, Berlin, Paris, and Lisbon, will enable him to render efficient and valuable service in the work of establishing friendly relations with all the colonial governments. Briefly stated, the plan of the Liberators' League is:

1. To found colonies for the refuge and settlement of liberated slaves, in conformity with the Brussels Act.
2. To secure from England, France, Germany, Portugal, or the Congo State, suitable concessions of land for the planting of colonies.
3. To settle freed slaves on alternate lots with the needful tools, seeds, clothing and food, to enable them to raise a first crop.
4. To teach them by example how to improve native house-building, also farming, industries, and new cultures of saleable produce.
5. To teach them reading, writing, arithmetic, geography by gradual steps, and give them practical undominational instruction in the Christian religion.

In all the colonies the chief causes of the African's miseries, namely: Witch-doctoring, poison-tests, heathen practices, polygamy with all its concomitants; intoxicating liquors and hemp-smoking; idleness and immoral white men, will be vigorously excluded. The settlers will be induced to work, and their produce will be purchased in exchange for useful articles of trade.

It is estimated that the cost of establishing and maintaining for the first year a colony of about two hundred men and women, would not exceed $10,000. The probable cost of emancipating a slave and giving a family a practical start in Christian civilized life would be about $50. Every person or company contributing $5,000 would have the naming of a settlement and a voice in its management. Each of the proposed colonies would have a competent staff of workers, viz.: A superintendent, a farmer and mechanic, and a teacher, assisted by African native Christians or colored Americans.

It is intended to organize branches of the League in the principal cities of the United States and Canada. Already a number of persons prominent in Christian and philanthropic work have agreed to serve as an Executive Committee.

At the recent African Congress, held at Atlanta, Ga., in December last, Bishop I. W. Joyce introduced and Ex-U. S. Minister to Liberia, Hon. John Smyth, seconded a resolution which was adopted, pledging support to the proposed League. Mrs. M. French Sheldon, the explorer, Mr. C. C. Adams, Dr. Josiah Strong, author of "Our Country," Judge Charles P. Daly, and many others, are taking a warm interest in the project. Dr. Louis Kloppsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has consented to act as Treasurer of the League, and all contributions in furtherance of its objects may be sent to his care and will receive acknowledgment. Requests for additional information, from those who desire to unite with the League as members and sharers in its philanthropic mission may be addressed to Mr. Chatelain, 118 East 45th Street, New York.

The photograph on this page represents a phase of African slavery which is, alas! too common in different parts of that country. Soldiers of the French Congo State on entering a village, liberated the slaves found there. Among others who were discovered was an unfortunate creature who had been tied up by the neck to a forked pole that projected from the end of his master's dwelling. The slave's hands were manacled so that it was impossible for him to make any effort to liberate himself. This manner of securing slaves is quite common among the slave-dealing tribes as well as among the Arabs. As the wretched victim can neither sit down nor rest for a moment, the torture of such a position as that shown in the photograph may be imagined.

Won From Sinful Lives.

At the new Home for Friendless Women, recently opened by Mrs. Josephine Williamson, at No. 125 W. Third street, New York, the work affords much ground for spiritual encouragement. The nightly Gospel meetings are well attended, and the interest is sustained throughout. There have been two conversions recently which present remarkable features. Both converts are girls who have been won from lives of sin to Christ. One (N. J. B.) writes:

"Thank God for the lighthouse on West Third street. Through trouble and the death of a darling child, I turned to drink. I had very good prospects and kind people, but it was no use. Every dollar I earned I spent for liquor, and then I got to stopping in the cheap lodging-houses. When I saw the way some people treated poor fallen women, I became an infidel. When I called on Mrs. Williamson we prayed together and the Lord saved me and took me back."

The other (signed D. M.) is a somewhat different case. After reciting her wrecked life she says:

"You have pointed me to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world, and I know he has taken all my sins away. How I wish I had served the Lord long ago! I was sick and he gave me rest—praise his name!—that the world cannot give nor take away."

During the last two or three months there have been from twenty-five to thirty-five rescued girls living at the Mission. It is, however, still very inadequately furnished. There are thirteen rooms, but the present equipment is equal to less than one-half that number, the demands for admission being greatly in excess of the number of applicants who can be accommodated.

IN CALIFORNIA SLUMS.

T Excellent Work of the Gospel Mission of Los Angeles—A Consecrated Effort to Reach the Non-church-going poor.

IN many remote parts of this Union, there are bands of brave, consecrated Christian workers who are laboring, week in and week out, year after year, to reach the unevangelized masses with the Gospel of Jesus. Such a work is that which is briefly described below:

H. A. GEITZ.
President, Pacific Gospel Mission.

Cal., was organized by Major George A. Hilton on Friday, Dec. 4th, 1891. Its model was the Central Union Mission of Washington, D. C., its object the establishment of an Evangelical Gospel Mission, Bible Institute and Workers' Training Cases for both sexes, the visitation of homes and institutions, the free distribution of God's Word and Christian literature, and a thoroughly organized and systematic work, to save the lost. The Board of Directors consisted of S. I. Merrill, Lyman Stewart, A. M. Armour, E. B. Hays, H. W. Mills, Judge McDonald, G. A. Hilton, W. W. Cockins and Geo. J. Binder. S. I. Merrill was elected President; E. B. Hays, Secretary; W. W. Cockins, Treasurer, and Major George A. Hilton, Superintendent. The first year's work was beyond expectation in growth and efficiency. Two branches were organized, one in the very slums of the city, on Aneda Street, and another at Pasadena, M Geo. A. Binder being in charge of the city branch, No. 1. Headquarters were established at Nos. 431-433 South Spring Street, and in January, 1892, a Bible Institute was established which proved very successful.

In the Summer of 1893, Supt. Hilton was called East as an evangelist, and the work without a head suffered great loss. M. A. W. Hare, a young man, took charge of it, and for a year, did most valiant service. In June, 1894, Evangelist C. S. Mason was called as Superintendent, and has filled the position for seventeen months, with the following results:

Attendance	50,493
Spiritual Meetings	919
Gifts	2,827
Families Supplied	207
New Testaments Distributed	140
Labels	43
Tracts	27,164
Boxes Fruit Distributed	23
Requests for Prayer	1,124
Confessed Christ	378
Mail Assisted	20,618

The organization is in touch, and co-operation with the National Gospel Union. The Sunday afternoon Bible school is composed mostly of adults, mainly laboring men. A light free lunch is served at 2:30, at 6 o'clock the school is called to order, cases arranged, and the Word studied. Then, after prayer, and remarks by the Superintendent of the school, Dr. J. T. Fee, the teachers are given five minutes for personal work, urging the men to accept Christ. The Gospel net is then drawn, an opportunity given to seek or confess Christ. Nearly every Sunday, somewhere away from home, decides for Jesus. On Sunday, Dec. 15th, nine came out for Christ. The Gospel Wagon has been effectively used, and probably twelve thousand people have thus heard the Gospel. Over a year ago, a drunkard got into the wagon, came to the Mission, found Christ, joined one of the city churches and is reunited with his loved ones. Some of the conversions are worthy of note. One was that of a drunkard, saved over a year; another, that of a man who testified: "One year ago I fought in a ring, and won over three hundred dollars; but now, since I have been converted, I have turned away from all such things, from the old companions, and I have peace with God, and friends, and a good position." A companion of this young man—converted on the same night—was present, and gave testimony. One man, who came to the Mission for a piece of bread and a cup of coffee is now a successful professional man in Los Angeles, converted, happy, a church member. Another is foreman of a ranch, and many are engaged in various occupations. They have united with the Methodist, Congregational, Baptist, Presbyterian, Lutheran and United Brethren. A goodly proportion of the converts stand fast.

The Shelter is a quiet place, where a few of the converts can be housed until they can better accommodate themselves. The general work is supported by monthly subscriptions, varying from ten cents to twenty-five dollars a month. Two godly men and one woman have each given twenty-five dollars a month toward the work. The Mission brings church people in touch with the masses, and is besides a training school for Christian workers. On Tuesday nights the Christian Endeavor Society has charge of the meeting, and on Wednesday the Young Men's Christian Association assumes this duty. On Monday evenings the young people of the Central Presbyterian Church have charge. Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday, the Superintendent, C. S. Mason, generally conducts the Evangelistic services.

S. J. MERRILL, ex-Pres. C. S. MASON, Supt. CHAS. H. BARKER, Vice-Pres.
OFFICERS OF THE PACIFIC GOSPEL MISSION, LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Nearly every night in the week some one decides for Christ.

The Mission's new Board of Managers consists of: H. A. Getz, President; C. H. Barker, Vice-President; T. E. Nichols, Secretary; B. Bassell, Treasurer; Lyman Stewart, S. I. Merrill, H. G. Wylie, W. A. Spence, Dr. Carson, M. Pierce, J. H. Myrick, D. Galbraith, Dr. Morris and C. S. Mason, Superintendent. The present quarters of the Mission was once the headquarters of a noted saloon. A young man, who lay dying, suddenly said to his mother, "the saloon will some day be a house of prayer, for God has answered my prayer." The proprietress recently refused to rent it for a saloon, even at an advanced rental, saying: "Although I did once keep the saloon, I cannot rent it for that business, for I am a Christian now."

A Ship Providentially Saved.
THAT obedience to God's commandments has repeatedly been the means of saving life and property is well known, but this truth has probably never been more strikingly illustrated than in the following incident: Three ships sailed from the port of Abeideen on a beautiful spring morning. They were all bound for Riga. Their names were "The Orlanda," "Duke of Westminster," and "The Georgiana." The young captain of the last-named vessel stipulated with the owners that he would never leave a port on the Lord's day. All the ships arrived at Elsinore on a Sabbath morning. Here it is customary to go ashore and get the ship's papers signed. Two of the captains did this, then straightway lifted their anchors and sailed away, the wind being in their favor. But the third captain determined to adhere to his resolution not to go ashore. He would in this way honor the Lord's day.

Monday morning came. Early he hurried ashore, got his papers signed, and returned to the ship, when unfortunately as it seemed, no sooner had he stepped on board than the wind suddenly changed against them! For three days they were hindered; but afterward a more favorable wind set in, and away they sailed, arriving at their desired haven. Hurrying along one of the streets, Captain Longmuir met Captain R. looking very sad and dejected. "What is the matter?" he asked. "Oh," replied Captain R., "if we had done like you that Sunday, we would not have to tell the tale we have. We sailed down into the narrow strait, and got into the open sea, where we were enclosed with with icebergs, and our beautiful new ships were crushed like bandboxes! The crews escaped on blocks of ice, and reached the

A NOBLE LIFE CLOSED.

BY the death of Rev. Sandford Hunt, D.D., which occurred recently in Cincinnati, O., the Methodist Episcopal Church sustains a distinct loss. There were few men in the United States more widely known and esteemed than he, not only in

THE LATE REV. SANDFORD HUNT

Methodist circles, but elsewhere, and his influence, always exerted in the best direction and for the noblest purpose, was commensurate with his loftiness of principle, his unswerving uprightness, and his loyal devotion to the cause of the Christian religion.

Sandford Hunt was a native of Western New York, and was born in 1825, of Methodist parents. He was converted at fifteen and joined the Church, of which he has all his life been a faithful and able servant. He received a collegiate education, and after finishing his studies, in 1847 joined the Genesee M. E. Conference. In 1872 his talents won recognition; he was elected to General Conference, and has since been a member of each succeeding General Conference. In 1876 he was chosen as a member of the General Book Committee, and in 1879 was elected Book Agent by the Book Committee, a position to which he was regularly re-elected every year. He also became Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, a position to whose duties he brought rare fidelity and practical judgment. He is generally conceded to have been one of the best-informed men in America on all that pertained to the mission fields of the world, and in all questions of plans or expenditures his counsel and wide knowledge were invaluable. Occupying several positions of so much prominence, he was peculiarly in touch with the whole M. E. Church throughout the United States. At the time of his death he had been attending a meeting of the Book Committee in Cincinnati. He was seized with apoplexy in his hotel, and expired almost instantly.

There were few men, in positions of authority, who carried more sympathy and consideration for others into their work than Dr. Hunt did. Frank and generous in disposition, sunny in temperament and intensely earnest in all that related to spiritual life, he was one who, from the very forces of his nature, made friends everywhere, and did much for the cause of religion in the circle in which he moved.

Recent Earthquakes in Rome.

Earthquakes shook the city of Rome very severely on two occasions recently. In the Vatican, the central seat of the Papal power, the effects have been most disastrous. There is no ruin, indeed, but the damage is of a serious nature, when it is considered that here are contained the works of art which make the Vatican world-renowned. The "lantern," as it is called, that crowns the dome of St. Peter's, and is about four hundred feet from the ground, had the windows in it almost all broken, and its columns are also damaged. In the Stanza or Chamber, where the ceiling and walls are covered with exquisite frescoes by Podeste, who died a few months ago, a portion of the ceiling has fallen. This makes a blank in the fresco from which it fell. In one of the chambers leading to the audience halls of the Vatican the earthquake has shaken the building so that a space of about an inch now intervenes between the marble sills of the windows and the marble paneling of the walls. Several walls, especially those of the circular tower of ancient date in which has been established the new observatory, show cracks that suggest a possible fall of the entire building, unless quickly repaired.

The Desire of All Nations.

So shall he sprinkle many nations. ISAIAH 55:5.
SAVIOUR, sprinkle many nations,
Fruitful let thy sorrows be;
By thy pains and consolations,
Draw the Gentiles unto thee;
Of thy cross the wondrous story,
Be it to the nations told:
Let them see thee in thy glory,
And thy mercy manifold.
Far and wide, though all unknown,
Pants for thee each mortal breast;
Human tears for thee are flowing,
Human hearts in thee would rest,
Thirsting, as for dews of even,
As the new-mown grass for rain;
Thee they seek as God of heaven,
Thee as One for sinners slain.
Saviour, lo, the isles are waiting,
Stretched the hand, and strained the sight,
For thy spirit, new creating,
Love's pure flame and wisdom's light,
Give the word, and of the preacher,
Speed the foot, and touch the tongue,
Till on earth by every creature
Glory to the Lamb be sung.

Rewards Coming.

IS it not most time for this world to cry out for God? It has swung off from him, and will bend better until it swings back. We have only a little over four years left in this century, and I am hoping that before its gates close some mighty regenerative force may move upon the nations. Why not this season? God could, if he would, in one day shake the two hemispheres of their abominations and lift them into the paradisaic. Perhaps he may; perhaps he may not. But I am sure that you and I can do a little toward hastening the consummation by prayer, by holiness of life, by cheering others, who in turn will cheer us. The work will be accelerated and the day roll on when we will all be millionaires, not with the riches that we may have to drop at one stroke of apoplexy, but with the eternal dividends that God will declare to those who have been faithful unto death, and though our graves should be so humble that they will never tempt a resurrectionist, our heavenly mansion, if we have been faithful, will be so bright that God and the angels and the spirits of just men made perfect will not be ashamed to be our perpetual guests. Oh, the billowy bloom of that hillside! Oh, the warm and aromatic breath of that summer!

Weather Probabilities.

BECAUSE some men have made good guesses we elect them apostles of guessdom. It is always safe to prophesy a storm in September, or a drought in summer, or a wet spell in April. The old almanacs issued on the first day of January, announcing that it would be clear or cloudy or wet on certain days in the following August or December, were just as trustworthy as the prophecies concerning cyclones, or droughts, or deluges, or earthquakes six weeks ahead. The Weather Bureau at Washington is providentially allowed to foretell atmospheric changes for weeks ahead, so that the storm signals may be lifted; but there are no infallible signs of the weather to enable the inspired Jeremiahs of the weather to foretell the showery lamentations of a whole season. God will keep a realm of foreknowledge which no human guess can ever invade. All hail to the weather prophets for the important knowledge presented to the people; but for the altar of these evil prophets we have no sacrifices. Thirteen are better than a whole lot of false prophets; there is one more to be happy; the only damage that comes from upsetting the salt-cellar is the trouble of sweeping up the salt: and after you have started on a journey it is better to go back and get what you have forgotten, and Friday, except Sunday, is the most fortunate day of the week.

The learned Dr. Johnson said he did not believe in ghosts. He had seen too many of them. Among all classes, learned and unlearned, there are superstitions lingering. We hear much talk about luck. There is no such thing as bad luck and no such thing as good luck, but a Divine Providence that controls all. We could not tell how many times we have met with what people call "good luck." If we were about to start on a journey and wanted fair weather, though we heard it storm in the night, we have almost always found that the sun shone brightly in the morning. If we had a bad cold and feared that we would not be able to preach next Sabbath, by the time the day came we were hale and hearty. If some one stole our umbrella, we generally found that an unknown person had lost his in our own hallway. We left our cane in the cars, but a friend presented us with another. Our carriage broke down, but we got the benefit of exercise in walking. We missed the train, but by that means escaped a terrible accident. A steamboat on the Hudson river took fire, but we had chosen that same night to go on the other, that came through undamaged. We never knew an unkind thing said about us, but it some way turned out to our advantage. Those which at the time we thought our worst disasters have really been our best blessings. While living in Philadelphia I had one morning an unexpected call for charity amounting to twenty dollars, and that afternoon, from the gutter on Chestnut street, I picked up a pocket-book containing twenty dollars, and tried in vain, by advertising it, to find its owner. Almost everything that we expected to turn out wrong has turned out right. We were fortunate in selecting our grocers, our tailors, our doctors, our friends. We were born in a very good place, at just the right time, and had the best of parents. We have had what people call "good luck" in the morning, good luck at noon, and good luck in the evening. We have had many sorrows, and trod on many sharp thorns, and drunk from many bitter cups, and looked into very dark skies, but still we can say, "Goodness and mercy have followed us all the days of our life." You call that "luck." I call it "Providence."

With these men who prophesy evil things I have no sympathy. If you must prophesy, prophesy good. Evil prophets guess wrong ten times where once they guess right. If about the 25th of December, "A green Christmas makes a fat churchyard," and then I watch, and that winter and spring are unusually healthy. If I see in the papers, as last spring, that the frosts have killed all the peach blossoms in Maryland and elsewhere, and that we shall have none of that fruit, I expect that there will be such an abundance as that which enriched our markets. When through the Associated Press in early summer I hear that all the Western crops have been burned out by the drought or drowned out by the rain, I expect we shall have great abundance of breadstuffs for ourselves and for foreign nations. A few years ago, in spring time, nearly all the doctors and all the scientists said that the then coming summer would have cholera. It had been marching this way, and it would be here as sure as July and August came. July and August came, but there was not one case of cholera in America that summer. Away with the evil prophets, whether they deal in crops, or earthquakes, or moral deterioration! The whole earth will yet bloom like the gardens of Chatsworth, and if the wrongs of this world are gigantic, the God who proposes to put them under foot is so strong that he could with one stroke of his little finger annihilate more worlds than the astronomer can in one night see through his telescope in the observatory. We admit that the castle of sin is strong, and in every embrasure is a loaded weapon, cannonading all the troops of God, terrestrial and celestial; but can the ocean drown a fly? Can a falling mountain kill a snail? Can the summer morning drink up a drop of dew? Then as easily can God overwhelm all sin and irradiate all darkness.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

J. W. K., New York City. Can you explain why the long in Daniel 7:25 thought that the fourth figure in the furnace was like the Son of God?

Probably no distinct impression was in the king's mind, beyond one of great beauty and majesty. He might use the expression as the best mode of intimating that the appearance was supernatural.

E. L., Anderson, Ill. 1. When and where was Alfred Tennyson, the poet born and when did he die? 2. Who was appointed his successor as poet laureate? 3. Where is Tennyson buried?

1. He was born at Somerby, Lincolnshire, England in 1809 and died Oct. 6, 1892. 2. Alfred Austin, whose portrait and biography were published recently in these columns. 3. In Westminster Abbey.

Subscriber, West Toledo, O. Is it not unwise to allow unconverted young people to join Young People's Societies? Will they not come to believe that conversion is unnecessary?

In all the Societies we know there is no danger of them getting that impression. The tendency is the other way. We believe that it is the common experience. Associate members are more likely to become active members, than are young people who do not join the Society in any way.

Reader, McKees Rocks, Pa. 1. Is it proper for a gentleman to raise his hat to another on the street? 2. Why do we so often see the word "Selah" in the Psalms and what is the meaning of the word? 3. In what part of the Bible can I find the words, "Cast your bread upon the waters?"

1. Yes, it is good form to do so, but it is optional; a slight inclination of the head is sufficient, except when there is a lady, in which case hats should be invariably lifted. 2. It signifies a pause in music. 3. See Eccles. 11:1.

A. C. P., Matfield, Mass., writes:

Our family have felt so sorry for the starving Armenians that I have tried to think of some way that we could all do for their relief, and I proposed that we all do without our supper, except one slice of bread apiece (no butter), which I felt wise for them to have, and that I would allow them eight cents each, and as there are six of us, it would be forty-eight cents a day. The first one to agree was Clarence, eight years old, then Archie, six years, then Helen, ten years, then Bertha, twelve years, and then their mother. It was rather awkward at first, but only six slices of bread were put on the table, and as I asked the blessing we all thought of those poor hungry ones, and were happy we could do a little for their relief. I send you $3.36 as the fruit of our self-denial.

C. J. E., Marsland, Nebr. 1. Is it right for Christians to get up a supper for a dancing-party, the persons being church members? 2. Should a young man ask a girl's parents if he can marry her when she is of age?

1. We have already answered a similar question repeatedly. Christians who have any desire for advancement in the spiritual life, would do well to forego dancing-parties. The dance has been the first step to the ruin of millions. 2. It is both customary and proper to do so, although she is legally her own mistress, being of age. Not to do so implies disrespect to her parents.

Subscriber, Madison, N. B. Will we love our friends in heaven better than other redeemed spirits?

There are many things relating to the future life that cannot be explained or answered in this life. The presumption is that pure affection and all the finer elements of character, will not only survive the change, but will be strengthened and spiritualized. In many passages in the Gospels we are led to infer that identity is to be preserved and that this being so, we shall know our friends and love them, though with a different love from that of earth.

Mrs. G. H. B., Pawtucket, R. I. Do you think it right for a minister to tell his young people, members of his church, that he sees no harm in their going to the theatre?

The theatre, dancing, and card-playing we regard as kindred amusements that ought to be avoided by all professing Christians, for the reason that, though not necessarily sinful in themselves, their associations and tendencies are all in the wrong direction and operate as a direct obstacle to spiritual growth. Thousands have traced to the theatre their first step downward to irremediable ruin. To the young it is especially dangerous, and we therefore consider the advice you mention as unwise and un-Christian in the last degree.

Editor, "The Christian Herald." Should I not be wiser to leave the matter of the theatre to the people? I have seen many who have been converted by the theatre. I have seen many who have been converted by the theatre. I have seen many who have been converted by the theatre.

The word "peacemaker" is retained in the Revised Version, so you may be sure it is the correct rendering. The Revisers were at extraordinary pains to have in every case the exact English equivalent where it was possible and the nearest to it, when it was not. 2. There are many acts recorded in the Bible of which God did not approve. Some of them by good men, too. There are cases (notably that of David II. Samuel 11), when God's displeasure was manifested. In the instance you refer to the conduct of mother and son was punished by lifelong separation and by great hardship for Jacob.

E. Smith, Wheatland, Mo. What is the meaning of the sticks mentioned, Ezekiel 37:16-17?

The figure is probably an allusion to the tribal rod mentioned in Numbers 17. The promise is of a reunion of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel in the last days. They separated, the accession of Rehoboam, son of Solomon ten tribes becoming united under Jeroboam (See I. Kings 12). The kingdom lasted 2 years. Various suggestions have been made as to the identity of the ten tribes. Some writers hold that the Anglo-Saxon race descend from them.

In a letter from a Reader in Great Bend, F. (who has been forwarding his copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to Bombay, India, at reading), he encloses this comment from the Bombay Guardian, which may interest the who have contributed to our Armenian Relief Fund:

The New York Christian Herald has an Armenian Relief Fund, to which its readers have generously contributed. The relief is distributed in cooperation with mission societies at work in Armenia. Some of the gifts forwarded to this Relief Fund have been very touching. Laces, valuables of various kinds, and many articles of jewelry have been received.

The Guardian appreciatively declares opinion that such work "may be a means untold blessing."

Mrs. H. M. Eddy, American Presbyterian Mission, Beyrout, Syria, writes:

I cannot refrain from telling how closely we are coming of the weekly mail and read your message to us. My husband and I have for forty years been Presbyterian missionaries in Syria. Every Sabbath evening my husband reads THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sermon to us. It gives us spiritual food keeps us in touch with the home land, and our interest and profit increase continually. One of our family has been especially helped. Also thank you for all the aid that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is giving the sufferers. We have had share in this land. What God plans and purveys we know not now but we shall know hereafter. We live in hope that out of this seeming desolation will spring rich fruits to God's glory.

"Reader," Deer Isle, Me. 1. What was the promise that Paul claimed Acts 22:28 to be? 2. Was Mary of the House of David? 3. Both Matthew and Luke give the pedigree of Joseph, which has no pertinence, if we believe in the miraculous conception.

1. The freedom of the city was granted Rome to persons who were born in other lands as a reward for distinguished services. 2. A Roman citizen was an important distinction, insuring a man respectful treatment wherever he might go. Paul's statement implies that this honor had been conferred on his father or some ancestor. The captain to whom he was speaking, had acquired it by purchase. 3. Luke's genealogy is now generally believed to be that of Mary. The passage relating to Heli, but he appears to have been his son in the legal and technical sense of being a husband of his daughter, that is his son-in-law. In a recently discovered Jewish document Mary is referred to as the daughter of Heli. Thus her descent from David, if the theory be correct, is established.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Quebec's Ice Carnival.

WINTER has furnished the quaint old town on the St. Lawrence with the materials for a brilliant and beautiful pageant. Some weeks ago preparations were commenced for turning the town into a city of palaces. Ice was the material of construction, and the ingenuity of the artists was exercised in producing new and wonderful forms with it. A grand process on the Esplanade, with a spiral tower a hundred feet high in the centre, was the crowning feature of the spectacle. A square fort was constructed on each side of the battlements were carried to the old city wall and ran along its top to graceful turrets at each end. By day, the fortress reflected the sunlight like a thousand mirrors, and by night a hundred thousand electric lights illuminated the fairy structure. In other parts of the city huge statues of ice rose to vast height. The Statue of Liberty in New York harbor was reproduced in ice, and the American colony read a great statue of George Washington stupendous blocks of ice, which resembled granite and red sandstone, the water of which they were composed having been added before freezing. The glittering splendor of these ice-travels was relieved by long avenues of evergreen trees and blue flags and bunting of the decorations. The streets were thronged day and night by gay crowds, attracted by the wonderful spectacle. Business was forgotten for the time, and merriment and gaiety reigned supreme throughout the city. By day there were games and skating exhibitions, and at night there were torchlight processions and entertainments, private and public, of all kinds. The closing scene was a grand display of fireworks, representing an attack on the ice tower. It was a brilliant spectacle, but there was no delusion as to its permanence; every one knew that the splendors of its palaces and fortresses would soon disappear. God's servants have given in all ages to get men to take the same view of the glories of this world, which must surely vanish as will the palaces of ice; but now as in the days of the Psalmist men do not believe it: "Their inward thought is that their houses shall continue forever and their dwelling places to all generations." Psalm 49: 11.

Mail Delayed Twenty Years.

A surprising discovery has been made atorgetown, Ind., by a Post-Office Inspector. The office there was in charge of an eccentric elderly woman, whose father had been Postmaster before her. Complaints about the way the business was conducted had been made to the Department and the Inspector went down to investigate. He found that the Post Office was located in a cottage of two rooms, the front room being the office and the rear the living room. The Postmistress, where she sat with ten persons around her. The floor of the rear room was thickly covered with mail matter, which had been received but never distributed. The Inspector sent for a handcart and had the papers taken to the common and invited the people to look them up over and take what belonged to them. The man found a hundred and forty-seven pieces of a periodical, which had been regularly mailed to him for years and had been retained in the Post Office. A further search revealed a number of sacks, made of old dress-skirts, and these were full of letters addressed to various persons in the village. Over four thousand letters had been consigned to the sacks, instead of being given to the persons to whom they were addressed. The postmarks on some of them showed that they had been mailed in 1876. None of the letters had been opened, but appeared to have been dropped in the sacks as they had been received. The collection had been begun by the father of the present post-mistress. Neither he nor his daughter appears to have had a dishonest motive in keeping back the letters. But the mischief they did is incalculable and in many cases irreparable. Among the saddest instances reported, is one in which a letter asked for forgiveness and reconciliation. Both would have been gladly given, but the request not being received, was not answered and the writer regarded the silence as refusal. It was a cruel thing to keep back such a letter. Ministers should be careful that no such calamity comes through their negligence. God's message should be delivered.

Say unto them, as I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live. Ezek. 33: 11.

Overwhelmed by an Avalanche.

A startling catastrophe is reported by the Alaska News. It states that a man sand feet and was fully fifty feet deep. The property was in litigation at the time otherwise the works would have been in operation and many lives might have been lost. The site of the buildings was a peculiar one. The small snow-slides which occur every winter take a lower path to the left of the site; but there was a huge glacier at the head of the gorge, which, if it ever fell, would annihilate any building erected on the site. The probability of its ever falling seemed so remote that it was decided to run the risk. The result shows the temerity of the selection. Men often act on the same principle as to their eternal interest. They are wise and prudent in avoiding the calamities of this life, but are careless about the greatest of all calamities—the loss of their souls. There are some of whom the Apostle says:

When they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them. (1. Thess. 5: 3.)

Has the Pole been Discovered.

A dispatch reached New York on February 13th which sent a thrill of wonder through the scientific community. It came from Irkutsk in Siberia by way of St. Petersburg and announced that Dr. Fridjof Nansen had discovered the North Pole. Nothing had been heard of Nansen since August 3, 1893, when his friends bade him farewell at Chaborowa in Siberia and saw him and his twelve companions sail through the straits of Jugor on their way to the unknown Northern regions. Nansen has made several journeys to the Arctic. His most famous achievement was crossing Greenland in sledges, a journey which man can get to heaven. Not they who oppose God and follow their own plans get there, but they who in a child-like spirit submit themselves to his way.

Let him take hold of my strength and he shall make peace with me. (Isa. 27: 5.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Notwithstanding the Prominent Notice Given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the fact that our stock of Dr. Talmage's great book, "The Pathway of Life," is fully exhausted and that it is impossible for us to get another edition, orders still come in at the rate of about one hundred a day.

While the demand for this book, of which a ~~seventy~~ ^{seventy} thousand edition has been disposed of at this office, is very gratifying, we cannot fill any further orders for the same, and such of our subscribers as may send in their subscriptions involving the delivery of "The Pathway of Life," simply compel us to return their money and the order. We shall be glad to fill orders for "From Manger to Throne" and the "Gospel Hymns" so long as the supply of these books may last and we seriously advise friends who contemplate securing either one or both of them, to do so quickly, but we cannot supply any more copies of "The Pathway of Life."

A Gift of Twenty-five Thousand dollars has been made to the Central Young Men's Christian Association of London by Sir George Williams, the founder of the movement.

Rev. W. D. Powell of Toluca, in Mexico, writes: "During last year there was steady growth in our work. I have gone from city to city and from town to town, and during the year have circulated twelve thousand Spanish Gospels."

Evangelist Hollis Jordan has been holding revival services at Essex Centre, Vt. Rev. L. B. Tenney, pastor of the church, writes us that a great blessing has attended the meetings. There have been many conversions.

The Christian Endeavor Topics for the prayer-meetings and the list of daily readings have been translated into French, German, Dutch, Danish, Hungarian, Polish, Italian and Russian, and inquiries regarding them have been made in Norway, Sweden, Spain, Austria and Greece.

At the Recent Meeting of the Managers of the American Bible Society, a letter was read from Rev. H. Loomis, stating that a Bible colporteur had been making a tour in Corea. Another colporteur is going through Siam.

Major Cole has been Conducting Union meetings in his own city, Adrian, Mich. Services were conducted in several churches by their own pastors. The meetings are growing in power and many conversions have taken place.

Miss Fanny Crosby, the Blind Christian poetess, whose songs of sweetness and inspiration have helped to lighten and cheer many hearts, gave an earnest, eloquent address to a band of Christian Endeavorers last week. Miss Crosby is seventy-six years old.

Special Noonday Meetings are Held Daily in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, Twenty-third street and Fourth avenue, New York, commencing at 12:15 o'clock each day. Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, of the Fifth avenue Baptist Church, and other prominent men lead the meetings.

At the Meeting on the Day of Prayer for Colleges three hundred students spoke of the religious life at Harvard University. The Y. M. C. A. and the volunteer Christian work done each week by groups of Harvard students in Boston, as well as of a recent significant religious movement called the United Societies. A large number of Harvard students have enrolled themselves in the Bible class conducted by Mr. F. G. Cook, of the First Church, Cambridge.

Major George A. Hilton is now at Colorado Springs, Colo., where fourteen Churches are uniting in a great revival movement. Major Hilton's work at Larimer, Wyo., was wonderfully blessed. He held some special meetings in the Penitentiary during the course of the revival, as its inmates seemed to be the only people in the neighborhood who were not at the services. Two of the State's judges accompanied him and were astonished at the effects of Major Hilton's eloquent Gospel appeals.

QUEBEC'S WINTER FESTIVAL—THE ICE TOWER.

who had come to Juneau from Upper Silver Bow Basin, declared that in crossing the mountain he had seen nothing but ruins in the place where formerly stood the stamp mill and offices of the Juneau Mining and Manufacturing Company. A party was at once sent on snow shoes to find out if the report was true. On their arrival they found that the whole of the extensive buildings and valuable machinery had been crushed by an avalanche, and the debris scattered through the canon. A crew of laborers was immediately dispatched to the scene to ascertain if the watchman who had charge of the premises had survived. It was hoped that he might have taken shelter somewhere, and be in need of rescue. The crew, however, could find no trace of him. When the snow was dug away, the appalling nature of the calamity was disclosed. The glacier had crushed the substantial buildings as completely as if they had been cardboard. Huge timbers had been broken in two and the roof of one of the buildings had been carried bodily nearly a mile from its position. Only a few heavy beams, sticking end-wise in the snow, remained to mark the place where a few days before had stood a ten stamp mill, an office building, a boarding-house, and a blacksmith's shop, and forty thousand dollars' worth of machinery. The avalanche which had wrought the destruction covered a distance of three thou-of three hundred miles which he accomplished in 1888. His present expedition originated in the theory that a current runs from the coast of Siberia across the North Pole to the west shore of Greenland. It was based on the fact that some relics of the Jeannette expedition which were left on the ice off the Siberian coast when that vessel was lost, were found four years afterward on the South-west coast of Greenland and it was difficult to explain their presence there on any other theory than that of their having drifted across the North Pole. Pieces of driftwood and other articles have been found at various times which also appear to have made the same journey. Dr. Nansen's plan was to run his ship, the "Fram," into the ice and let it drift with the current in the hope that it might follow the same course. If he has reached the Pole, he has solved a mystery which has piqued explorers for more than a hundred years and has cost many lives. The news at present lacks confirmation and is not generally credited by scientific men, but all admit that it may be true. Nansen, himself was confident of success. He said that in all former expeditions an attempt had been made to oppose nature and force a way to the Pole, but his principle in committing his ship to the guidance of the current was to put himself in accord with nature which he believed was the true principle. Whether that principle Shopping in the Orient.

It charms the Women There Just as it Delights their Western Sisters—Grand Bazaars and Humble Sidewalk Vendors.

SHOPPING possesses delights for the feminine heart the world over. Whether it be in the bazaars of Cairo, Alexandria, Damascus, or Jerusalem, the great emporiums of Vienna, Berlin, St. Petersburg, or Rome, or the still vaster stores of Paris or London, there is, to the mind of the average woman, the same delicate appreciation of the beautiful and varied products of human handiwork and human ingenuity that we see in our own great cities. Yet shopping in the Orient is a very different experience from shopping in Europe or America. One wanders about the bazaars of Aleppo or Beyrout, bewildered no less by the riches and variety than by the vivid colorings of their exhibits of silks, linens, and cotton fabrics, the beauty of the workmanship in gold, silver, and brass, and the quaintness of the articles offered to pilgrims as souvenirs of famous places. Every traveler, who has visited Palestine, has been both surprised and delighted with the dainty trinkets sold in almost every city and village, produced by native artisans with the most primitive tools. Bethlehem, especially, excels in the manufacture of keepsakes of mother-of-pearl, olive-wood, or bone, and large quantities are shipped to merchants in every part of the world, particularly to France, Spain, and Portugal. There is another class of souvenir dealers who trade in cheaper articles, the traffic in which rarely goes beyond the boundaries of Palestine. Still another class—the peddlers or peripatetic vendors—search out the cities of Syria, Asia minor, Central Turkey and Mesopotamia. When they reach a city they rarely hawk their wares, as Western peddlers do, but rather seek a suitable place where they can spread out their merchandise in public view. In every large Eastern city, in the bazaar quarter, such vendors may be seen, and they form by no means the smallest among the attractions that allure the traveler.

Perhaps the most characteristic native shops in Jerusalem are those in the street leading from the Damascus Gate. They have been compared to huge cup-boards, with all their contents exposed to the passer-by. This street ends in a maze of bazaars that occupy the centre of the town. Again, along the walls beside the Jaffa Gate, and in front of the Citadel, where there is an open space, the tradesfolk have long had a favorite market-place. Some display their wares in booths; others simply spread mats on the ground, while still others sit on piles of brushwood or low stools, made of rushes, with baskets of lemons, oranges, raisins and figs in front of them. Our illustration on this page shows a typical group of fruit vendors of this class. Turbans or cloth caps are the prevailing headgear, and the abbas, or loose coat peculiar to the East, is the universal garment. It is amusing to note the dignified manner of some of those bearded and turbaned patriarchs, as they squat behind their little pile of figs or oranges, which they sell by weight. So primitive is the mode of doing business, and so merciful the mercy of the vendor, and must trust to his honesty and fair dealing. But the Oriental is usually a shrewd trader, and not above taking advantage of the generosity or credulity of strangers. He usually asks several times the price he expects ultimately expects to get for his wares.

Courteous Children.

If a child has shown any lack of courtesy toward another, whether a person of his own age or older, he should be instructed to be frank and outspoken in expression of his regret for his course, and of his desire to be forgiven for his fault. True courtesy involves a readiness to apologize for any and every failure, whether intentional or unintentional, to do or say just that which ought to have been done or said; and the habit of frank apologizing is acquired by a child only through his careful training in that direction. He who has any reluctance to proffer apologies on even the slightest cause for them, is sadly lacking in the spirit of courtesy. If a child is seen to be lacking in courtesy, his parents are understood to be at fault in his training.

Flowers for Birthdays.

In giving a little birthday party for the children the table at which they are to sit should be decorated with the birthday flower of the month in which they were born: January, snowdrop; February, the primrose; March, violet; April, daisy; May, hawthorn; June, wild rose; July, lily; August, poppy; September, convolvulus; October, hops; November, chrysanthemum; December, holly. Each has an appropriate sentiment attached to it. The snowdrop means consolation; the primrose, youthful sunshine; the violet, modesty; the daisy, innocence; the hawthorn, hope; the wild rose, simplicity; the lily, purity; the poppy, the comfort of sleep; the convolvulus, contentment; hops, aspiration; the chrysanthemum, cheerfulness; holly, foresight and protection.

Home Readings.

Taste for reading, writes Charles Dudley Warner, is most easily acquired in early years, and without effort in a family atmosphere favorable to it. Commonly the most important, the determining years of training for a child are between the ages of five and ten, and this is as true with regard to the mental growth that comes by means of books as it is with regard to the Serving God in Trifles.

Children are sometimes tempted to think of God only on Sundays or at times when engaged in religious services—that he is to be obeyed in worship. But he is to be obeyed in work, and in all the work that his children are called to undertake. There is a story told of a very small congregation. It consisted of only twelve persons, but they all agreed to do something in the service of God. They had a meeting to arrange plans and appoint "to every one his work." They began at the oldest and came down the list of members to the youngest. Some agreed to teach the young, some to visit the poor, some to conduct "little prayer-meetings," some to circulate tracts. This was all good, useful work. The youngest member was a servant girl. She was asked what she would undertake. She was very shy and felt herself very helpless, but she modestly answered, "I will try and serve God in the trifles of my common life. It is said that the old minister, on hearing this, replied, 'Brethren, the youngest member will beat us all.' That 'youngest member' certainly teaches us all a lesson. To serve God in the 'trifles of our common life' is the duty and the privilege of God's obedient children. We are called upon to be living epistles of the Lord Jesus Christ, and on every side of our life there must be written in Christian deeds the Gospel we have believed."

Be Useful and Happy.

It is scarcely possible to say how very, very useful a truly good and happy child can be. I heard a French pastor, who has done much for Christ, illustrate this. A little girl had learned to read the Bible. She used to read portions to her mother. "I wish I could read," said the mother; "but it is too late to learn!" "No, mother," was the answer: "I will teach you." And she sat patient every day and taught her mother. And some of the neighbors, when they heard, wished to be taught, too. And so a class of older women gathered around the little girl. "There I found her," said the pastor, "going over the Primer, all listening to her, and following her; and then, when the lesson was over, she read them a part of the Bible." Christ's welcome was overflowing from her to them. The rill that had been opened in her own soul was in her a well of water springing up to everlasting life.

A Little Child's Hymn.

THOU that once, on mother's knee,
Wert a little one like me,
When I wake or go to bed
Lay thy hands about my head;
Let me feel thee very near,
Jesus Christ, our Saviour dear.

Be beside me in the light,
Close by me through all the night;
Make me gentle, kind, and true,
Do what mother bids me do;
Help and cheer me when I fret,
And forgive when I forget.

Once wert thou in cradle laid,
Baby bright in manger-shade,
With the oxen and the cows,
And the lambs outside the house:
Now thou art above the sky;
Canst thou hear a baby cry?

Thou art nearer when we pray,
Since thou art so far away;
Thou my little hymn wilt hear,
Jesus Christ, our Saviour dear,
Thou that once, on mother's knee,
Wert a little one like me.

—PALGRAVE

A Royal Early Riser.

LITTLE Queen Wilhelmina of Holland (writes Arthur Warren in the Ladies' Home Journal), rises at 7 A.M. throughout the year. She breakfasts eight and at nine o'clock her lessons begin. The study she likes best is history. The morning studies are stopped at half-past eleven, and then she goes for a drive. No matter what the weather is, nor what the season, she drives in an open carriage. At half-past twelve she has luncheon with her royal mother. After the luncheon is over she takes another short drive accompanied by her mother, or by Miss Van Pall, one of the superintendents of the child's education. When she returns from her second drive, she has lessons again until half-past four o'clock. At half-past four there is tea. Then at dinner-time she is free to amuse herself as she pleases. She roams in the palace gardens, has an out with her ponies, or plays with her dolls. At half-past six dinner is served. In the evening, if the weather is fine, little Queen Wilhelmina gets into the open air for half an hour's drive or walk. Her hour for retiring is as regular as the hour for rising. She is in bed at ten each night, and lights are out. This part of the daily regime is the one which pleases her least of any. Few interruptions to the child's studies are permitted. Whenever or wherever she goes, a portion of each day is given up to her books.

If Queen Wilhelmina were asked some peasant maiden of her own country whether in the dignities of queenship there is much satisfaction for a little girl, she would answer "No." To be so, there is some amusement to be got out of her position, but not so much as if she were the daughter of a rich Dutch burgher or of a farmer. For one thing, the playmates of the child-Queen can be very few, and as there are no brothers or sisters in the family, the girl's life has so far been spent almost entirely among persons much older than herself. There is a genuine affection for her throughout the country, and for good reason, for she is a very lovable child. The sweetness of her nature shines through her face.

Angels Stop to Listen.

Rev. Dr. Drummond tells this pretty incident: A little girl once said to her father, "Papa, I want you to say something to God for me, something I want to tell him very much. I have such a little voice that I don't think he could hear it any up in heaven; but you have a great man's voice, and he will be sure to hear you." The father took the little girl in his arms and told her that, even though God were surrounded by all his holy angels singing to him one of the grandest and sweetest songs of praise ever heard in heaven, he would say to them, "Hush! Stop singing for awhile. There's a little girl away down on the earth who wants to whisper something in My ear."

Missionary Heroes.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor topic for the Week Beginning March 8. Corinthians 11 : 23-28.

NO stronger proof could be given of the fact that Christianity does not undermine manliness than is furnished by the records of missions to the heathen. The qualities a man must have, who, knowing the character of the people to whom he goes, the climate in which he must live, and the toil and privations he must undergo, voluntarily enters on the career of a missionary, are those of the highest order in human nature. These men have not had the honor that belongs to them. They have not sought it, but we are assured that He whom they serve has taken account of all they do and suffer in his case, and will reward them as they merit. It is no light matter with many of them to break up family ties, to bid farewell to home and family, even if they were going out in quest of fortune, and were expecting a life of ease and luxury. They must suffer the pain of parting, with the possibility of never seeing their loved ones again. Some of them go to lands where the climate has proved fatal to their predecessors; others to regions which have slaughtered the messengers of peace, and are likely to kill them. If we analyze the character of a hero, we find in the foreign missionary all the qualities that make up such a character. Courage is a conspicuous degree, the courage that supports a man in the face of death by disease, by savage beasts, and scarcely less by the magnanimity that enables them to sacrifice themselves that men who are strangers to them might have the blessing of religion; and enthusiasm that so fills their hearts that they lay down all the good life in a cause, which can bring them no reward on this side the grave, except that of seeing the kingdom of their Lord extended through their efforts. Such characteristics are heroic in the very highest sense. Nor are their lacking equal tests of these qualities which have proved that these soldiers of the Cross are men and women of true fibre, whose heroism no danger could daunt and no threats could overcome. The records of the Foreign Missionary Societies are replete with the achievements and sufferings and triumphs of these noble servants of Christ. A few instances out of thousands will suffice. Adoniram Judson, suffering imprisonment for two years in Burmah under conditions that would have broken the spirit of any ordinary man. John Williams taking his life in his hand as he went to the islands of the South Sea which he knew to be inhabited by cannibals and at last perishing as he expected he would under their fierce cruelty. Vanderkemp braving the wrath of the Boers of South Africa and deaf to their threats, exposing before the eyes of the world the inhuman cruelties they practised to the Kafirs and Hottentots. Robt. Moffat going to Africa as the outlaw, whose treachery and ferocity were a byword throughout Africa, and boldly placing himself in his power, winning the savage as a trophy of the Cross. Add to these, the martyrs, like Annington and Stewart and men who have faced death and lived, like Carey, Martyn, Eliot, Coan, Paton, Mackay, Kniell, Hauffner, and many others, who counted their lives dear to them, and it will be seen that the Prince of Peace is served by heroes as intrepid and as valiant as those who serve earthly monarchs.

The Saviour For You.

OH, have you been told of that Saviour who came
To die for all sinners like me?
And have you been told of his wonderful name,
And all that this Saviour will be?
His name is called Jesus, he saves us from sin.
His love is far-reaching and true.
He died on the Cross my salvation to win,
And he is the Saviour for you.
The soul that is hungry he fills with "good things,"
The thirsty are ever supplied;
The sorrowing spirit triumphantly sings,
When Jesus is Shepherd and Guide.
Oh, soul, have you taken this Saviour so dear,
Who lengthen your heart to renew?

To-day he is bringing salvation so near,
Oh, he is the Saviour for you!
Dear soul, you are fainting with famine, with Oh, come to him just as you are! [strife;
And ask for the bread and the water of life,
And peace that no trial can mar.
In penitence down at his feet will you fall?
Far more than you ask will he do.
A wonderful Saviour is Jesus for all,
And he is the Saviour for you.
CHORUS.
Oh, come to this wonderful Saviour to-day,
This Friend everlasting and true.
A wonderful, wonderful Saviour for me,
And a wonderful Saviour for you.

The Midnight Cry.

The Clues Prophecy Gives us as to the Nature and Characteristics of the Warning.

BY REV. E. J. HYTCHE.

IT seems strange to us that five of the virgins who went out to meet the Bridegroom were unprepared to meet him when he came, we have only to look around at the present condition of the Church, and we shall see the picture as our Lord drew it was true to fact. If he came to-day—if at this hour the cry was raised, "Behold, he cometh; go ye out to meet him," how many would be ready? How many at that critical moment would be distractedly seeking the spiritual life which has been so long offered to them? Now, people who are called Christians and who call themselves Christians are mixing with the world, amusing themselves, not giving thought and effort to attaining spiritual growth, neglecting their souls and giving their attention to the acquisition of money and social advantages. They have their lamps but there is no supply of oil with them. When they are awakened by the midnight cry they will be dazed, bewildered, their lamps will be flickering and while they seek the oil to revive them—the strength and grace which the Holy Spirit imparts—the door will be shut. The very mention of this hope of the Lord's coming, provokes, in some Christian circles, a smile of pity. The man who professes to cherish it is looked upon as a fanatic, a dreamer. Happily, the certainty of this hope has been held and proclaimed by such eminent servants of Christ as Spurgeon of London, Gordon of Boston, Bishops Bickersteth, Ellicott and Ryle, Dr. Horatius Bonar and Dr. Newman Hall, as well as such evangelists as Lords Radstock and Adelbert Cecil, and Messrs. Denham Smith, Moody and Muller. Yet, after all, they are as units, when compared with religious teachers at large. Another reason why the imminence of the translation of the living Church is tabooed, doubtless springs from the fact, that so many dates have been fixed for the midnight cry, which have proved to be unfounded when the calculated period arrived. But surely such mistakes in calculating the exact time of its occurrence is no reason why the warning word of our Lord should be ignored. For the fact still remains that such a crisis in the history of the Church will transpire, however uncertain may be the period, and hence it should rather stimulate to a more prayerful study of the subject by the living Church in order that (Luke 21: 24), it may not be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this world, so that that day may not come upon it unawares. Now, in connection with this uncertainty as to the exact period of the midnight cry, and the disappointments thereby entailed, we are prepared by the prophet Habakkuk who, in referring to the last days, says (Hab. 2: 3): "The vision is for an appointed time—but at the end it shall speak and not lie: though it tarry wait for it, because it will surely come"—it will not tarry one moment beyond the day and hour predetermined and fixed in the Divine counsels. Christians ignore the doctrine, for it only confirms the old Pauline analogy, "If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle?" (To be Continued.)

CHAPTER VI.

EEK-A-BOO!"

It was a child's voice at the captain's open door challenging his attention as he lay upon his bed. But he rested in a kind of doze. It was a half-way halting place between Wide-awake Land and Slumber Land. Then the child stealthily advanced and peeped round the side of the door. Emboldened, she stole to the bed and half in awe gazed at the patient. When he had fully come back to Wide-awake Land, looking up he saw two large, dark eyes that rose above the edge of the high bed, and steadfastly, sympathetically looked at him. He smiled.

"Me know you," she said.

"Well, you are a nice little girl, but I don't know you."

"Me Ethel, you the Cap'n."

"Ethel, is it! And I'm the Cap'n, but a poor, weak, sorry-looking Cap'n. Don't you want to come in and sit down?"

She sat down in a chair, folded her hands in her lap and then pityingly watched him. She steadily looked at him out of those big, black, brilliant eyes.

"Don't you sing? Seems to me I heard a little girl's voice out in the kitchen, yesterday. Now you sing for me, can't you?"

"Yes," she replied, and without the bashfulness of older years, without any effort at emphasis or expression, she just opened her pretty mouth and let the music out in a very natural way. She sang snatches of nursery-compositions, and then of Sunday School hymns. Her small audience was very appreciative. After awhile, the singer wanted a change.

"Where's your little girl?" she asked.

"My little girl?"

"Cos I want to play with her."

"My little girl!" he exclaimed. "My poor little girl!"

To Ethel's surprise and disappointment, the Captain turned over and gazed abstractedly at the opposite wall. To arouse him she coughed and she hemmed, using the strategy of older people. He paid no attention to her. He only looked at the wall opposite. She bore it as long as she could, and then slipping out of her chair, stole from the room to find Janet.

In the kitchen, Janet was ironing. She felt a hand tugging at the skirt of her dress. She looked down. There was Ethel.

"He sick! The Cap'n sick!"

"You think he's sick?"

Ethel nodded her head.

"Well, I will see about it. You can run home now."

When Janet went into the sitting-room, there was John still gazing at the wall. Surfaces that are plain, that are unoccupied by figures, are better for the sick. They are not confusing and wearying. This wall-paper was covered with groups of palm-trees. Sometimes, there would be three and at times four rising near what might be a spring in the desert, or—something.

"Are you sick, John?" asked Janet, solicitously.

"Well, cousin," he replied, "those palm-trees bother me. If it be water there, seems to me there is more than enough in that house. I say, well, I am—"

"Oh, I wouldn't look at them. You know."

She went away and came back with a bundle of nails. She hung from several nails driven into that perplexing wall.

"There, look at that! It won't tire and perplex you."

"Oh, thank you, cousin! Do you know what you are fitted for, or one of the things?"

"One of the things? That is something, if you think I can do more than one thing."

"I think you would make an excellent nurse for soldiers."

She started. She did not care to tell him how much her thoughts had been at the war, in imagination looking into the camp of this regiment or that, now searching a hospital, then glancing along the line of a weary column toiling over a road, and all the while wondering where Winthrop Melrose was. Was he again sick? Was he in a hospital now?

"But that would be hard work, cousin, hard work. Now I would try to rest, John. I am afraid that small, black-eyed caller was too much of a task for you."

The mention of this subject, a small, black-eyed caller, aroused him at once. "I can't rest just yet. I must say something, Janet. She wanted to know where my little girl was. And don't I wish I knew where she was! Some kind people in a New York home told me they would take care of her—in an institution, you know. Well, it was my fault—I did not go for her. Those were the days after my wife's death when I was going all wrong, it must have seemed to anybody who knew me. And my baby girl I put in this home. Well, I didn't go for her for some time—how I regret it! The people there heard that I was dead and let the child go into the hands of a lady whose name they had but I found the lady had died. That was a real death, it seems—different from mine. She, it seems, had given my little girl away before death to a family who had gone out of the city and all trace of whom had disappeared."

"John, you are getting tired. Don't talk any more now. I understand. I will remember what you say."

"Oh, will you? If you should be in New York, would you inquire?"

"It is all set down on a slip of paper in my pocket-book just where the institution is, you see."

His mind seemed to stray now.

"But there, I could not tell her if I should see her. She was a baby then, very small, thin and nipped, and she has changed within a few years—they always do. But there's her mother's picture. I left that with her, and they said at the home, it went with her when the lady who died took her. Oh, I couldn't tell her! I shouldn't know my own child even."

"Now rest, cousin. I won't forget. I'll ask about her. I'll get the address of the New York home."

The next morning my captain was not so well bodily as the day before, and that lurking fever-fiend which Dr. Bent had been watching for, threatened to make a close assault. In mind, John was very active. He had a proposition to make to Janet; "I think, cousin, I would like to make my will."

"Your will, John?"

"I don't know but you wonder if I have anything to give away."

He tried to smile, and then he spoke again.

"And perhaps you think the making of a will has a mournful sound. May be so, but I wanted to be on the safe side, you know. There's my child, too. I have not saved much, but since I have been in the army, I have laid by something. It is tucked away in the bank. Not much, but still something to be given to my child, or somebody."

"Oh, John, what is her name?"

"Carrie, or it was when the little thing was with me. That is her baptismal name. What name people give her now, I can't say. Oh, dear, why did I act so unworthily as a father?"

"Now, cousin! Your nurse must use her authority. You let me take everything into my hands. Since it will make you easier, I will send for Lawyer Manning."

"Not Skeele, no, no!"

"For Manning," said Janet, decidedly,

"and ask him to be here in the morning. He will look after everything and your will shall be properly made out. Now rest! That is a good cousin!"

"Oh, thank you!"

He turned toward the wall draped with the soft gray shawl, Janet's hand softly resting on his forehead. His eyes closed. His thoughts drifted away. Sleep bore him captive to her chambers of silence.

CHAPTER VII.

So Sudden!

That very day, while John Morton was sleeping, into the old home of his boyhood stole sleep's twin-brother, Death, and without a sign to Pauline Davis down in the kitchen, or Mrs. Blakey Chase doing a little chamber-work in another room, or to Sandy who was working out in the carriage way and often looked up to the window of madame's chamber. Death bore away her soul. He came to madame's bed noiselessly as shadows steal over the floor. She neither saw nor heard him. He pressed gently on the weary, drooping eyelids. He laid a hand on the feebly beating heart. That was all. He stole out of the house as silently as he entered.

Mrs. Blakey Chase was the first one who found it out. She soon entered madame's room—indeed during the late "ill turn" she had hardly been absent from it—and now stepped promptly to the bed. "Mussy!" she exclaimed as she looked at the set, still, face. Then she flew to the head of the kitchen-stairs. She shrieked, "Oh, P'leen, P'leen! Quick! Do come!"

That was all to bring Paulina, her hands covered with flour, from her work in the kitchen.

"Quick!" said the beckoning, awestruck Mrs. Blakey.

"Why, what is it, Miss Blakey?"

"Oh!—oh! dear! There! See!"

Together the women bent over the bed.

"Why, if she ain't gone!" said Paulina.

Yes, gone! There was no misinterpreting that changed face. The late visitant at the Morton mansion had done a work that he never yet failed to do thoroughly when really starting out to accomplish it.

"Oh!—oh!" moaned Paulina, and then the warm-hearted woman threw herself down in a chair and buried her tearful face in her floury hands.

Mrs. Blakey proceeded also to wipe away a tear or two, but her sympathy took a more practical turn.

"Don't know, after all! Might be!"

"Wouldn't do any harm to see! P'leen!" she ejaculated, "I have a great mind to see if she can't be brought to and git the doctor here and—"

Sandy soon brought the doctor.

Doctor Bent shook his head as he laid a hand on madame's heart, and said patronizingly decidedly, "Good people, it is of no use. She's gone! Been dead some time! You had better do the next thing."

The next thing was the "laying out."

The two women worked away, tenderly, reverently, in awe, till that last office had been discharged. When all was over, the quiet sleeper was left alone in a room where the curtains at the windows now fell lower than ever by day, and at night no light was seen shining.

"Seems awful queer," soliloquized Paulina, "to look up at that side of the house at night and not see any light there. Been a-burnin' there night after night, and now it is all dark!"

It was Paulina who took the news down to Janet Morton.

"So sudden!" she said, when she burst into the house. "Hain't you heard of it? Oh, so sudden!"

"Why, what, Paulina?"

And then Paulina told the story of the hasty, unexpected going.

"Awful suddin, isn't it, Janet?"

"Yes, Paulina, but then death always comes suddenly. We never are ready for it, even when we are looking for it."

"I s'pose so," replied Paulina, dutifully wiping her eyes. Then she changed the subject.

"There! Some things rile me! I was a-goin' out of the house when that Lavina Skeele called. She hadn't heard of the news, and it seemed to unman her. Took on and said she had lost a dear friend. She has been a-comin' a week or more, every day, and has pretended to be dreadfully intimate with the old lady. So strange to me! I don't understand it. She never used to."

"I suppose I must tell John about his mother," remarked Janet.

"Must you?"

"Yes; he will want to know. He asks every day about her."

"Oh, Janet, you knew the madam made her will?"

"Oh, yes! Of course! You told me."

"And he is remembered."

"John?"

"Anyway, we think he is remembered."

Sandy saw John's name in the will.

Sandy had not told that he saw another name, Judson Skeele Morton, stretching beyond the margin of the will.

"Then madame has been very much interested in John, and once she said—heard her—sez she, 'I mustn't forgit John when I give my things away.' So puttin' everything together, I think there is no doubt John will git suthin'."

In various ways an impression went out and reached everybody who knew John that his mother had not forgotten him. The making of the son's will did not take place so soon as anticipated. He had a attack which Janet feared might be the rival of those dreaded typhoid tendencies in force. He rallied, though, and Lawyer Manning came to superintend the making of the will. He had a trusty face. He looked at people when he spoke to them. Nobody feared his blue eyes. Everybody confided in his gray hairs. He was an attorney who made it his business to keep people out of law rather than to get the into it. His stout, compact form was kind of bulwark against wrong-doing, while a refuge to oppressed right-doers.

"We are all ready, John," he said, encouragingly. The patient had been bolstered up in bed. He wanted Blakey Chase near him, as he was an old friend and expected to be a witness to the will.

"I want you to hear all I have got to say, you as well as Squire Manning, for it may be of importance," he said, "and want as much witnessing as possible."

He was thinking of his child. It was touching to notice how his affection cared went out toward the little bark that had drifted off upon the great, unknown ocean. It was a remorseful affection, for he knew he had allowed the bark to drift away. It was now well understood that by the late Madame Morton's will he had been made one heir to her estate. All his interest in this he passed over to his cousin Janet, to hold in trust for his child, that drifted bark should not come ashore after a certain number of years, the property went to Janet. He disposed of the savings he had accumulated during the war, remembering various friends, as then said, "All done!" The will was duly witnessed and signed, and Janet went his bedside to resume her place as nurse.

"You are tired, cousin," said Janet.

"Yes," replied John, with a smile "tired, but relieved. I put my child in God's hands. I would have liked to see her. He knows best. I put everything into his hands. I want to leave off in the world right, and begin right the next or It is all we can do, to put everything, even our mistakes, into his hands. Yes, I must put our lives, our all into his hands. We can't go astray, cousin, if we do that."

"No, John."

"Yes, all into his hands."

"Now I would be quiet." She soothed his brow with her hand. He fell asleep.

Her Little Class.

I DON'T think I'll go to Sunday School to-day, Fanny."

"Why not, Geraldine?" said Fanny, who was putting on her arctics and her waterproof, and getting ready to face an inclement world of out-door storm and wind. Fanny looked the stronger of the two sisters, and like most girls of the period, was accustomed to battle with all sorts of weather, the day having passed when women, old or young, in health, coddle themselves and stay in the house on account of either rain or snow. Geraldine, however, though pale, had not the appearance in the least of an invalid, and in fact could tire her sister out at tennis or golf, so that Fanny was unprepared to hear her say:

"Oh! it's such a wet, wild kind of a day, and my book is so interesting, and the fire on the hearth is so bright. I think I'll take the day off. Besides, my class will be very small on such a day; most of the girls live at a great distance, and those who do come will understand that the storm detained me."

Fanny fastened the last button of her rain-cloak, and took up her Bible and her umbrella. She said nothing, but sometimes silence is more expressive than speech. At the door she turned an instant, and holding the knob in her hand, made this remark:

"Geraldine, have you asked the dear Lord's blessing on your absence?"

Then she went on. Geraldine heard her quick, decided steps as she ran down stairs, her little emphatic closing of the front door, and knew just how she looked as she walked with her firm, elastic tread, down the long, rain-swept street.

"Dear Fanny," she said to herself, "she wouldn't compromise with her conscience. God's blessing on my absence—isn't that suggestion like Fan? As if it were a crime not to go to one's Sunday School class, or as if I had not gone every Sunday, rain or shine, the whole winter long! Well, I cannot be ruled by Fanny." And she turned to her book, settling herself composedly in her luxurious easy chair, with her feet on a hassock.

Just then there came a gale which fairly shook the windows till they rattled, banged the shutters, broke a branch from the tree before the door, and tore round the corner with a howl like a pack of wolves let loose. Following this the rain and sleet came dashing down in furious swirls. The tempest was worse than when Fanny had started. Geraldine was glad she was not in it. But—"God's blessing on my absence" kept winding itself in and out of her head, like the refrain of a song. She was not at ease.

Suddenly, she pitched her book into a corner of the room, took off her slippers, made a dive into the closet for her boots and India rubbers and a clutch for her shortest skirt and her thick mackintosh, and presto! she was dressed and out of the house and flying down the street like a fairy. She to be defied by a Sunday storm, when a week-day one never held her back, was a new experience. And as she walked, she sang the "Bells" and just as they stood up to sing the second hymn, and walking in, breathless and panting, but sweet as a rose and fair as a lily notwithstanding, to take her place and meet her little class. It was a very little class that stormy day—only one sad-faced girl—but Geraldine knew that Madge had walked two miles to get there, and the glance of happy welcome, and the warm squeeze from the hand repaid her for her race against the whistling, lashing wind.

Fanny, from her own place among the boys, at the other side of the room, flashed her sister an approving smile, and though it was hidden in the depths of his brown beard, and the lips did not reveal it, a smile kindled and glowed and almost danced in the brown eyes of the Superintendent, Mr. Holly, who was very much in love with Miss Geraldine Butler, but thus far had allowed prudence to hold his admiration in leash, not feeling sure, either, that she would, for an instant, entertain his suit, if proffered, or that she, with all her grace and beauty, would be the right kind of a wife for a man who would have a tough tussle with fortune, before he could win and hold his place in the world. As he gave out the responsive reading, he made up his mind,

He either fears his fate too much
Or his deserts are small,
Who dares not put it to the touch
To win or lose it all.

Geraldine went faithfully over the lesson with Madge, and then, the two being quite alone, they had a sweet heart-to-heart talk. Madge told her teacher and friend that things were not cheerful at home; her father had lost his place, her brother had fallen into bad company, and her own small salary as a type-writer was just now all that stood between the family and actual want. "We don't very well know how we'll pay the room-rent, unless pa gets work soon," said poor Madge, with a half sob, bravely repressed. "Ma is trying to find sewing, but nobody seems to have any to give out, and she can't leave home."

"I'll find her some plain sewing, Madge," said Geraldine, knowing how easily among her friends, she could find this lady who needed new night-gowns, or that one who had pillow-slips to hem, or the other who wished a supply of children's aprons. "That is, dear," she added, "if she really is an expert seamstress." Geraldine knew perfectly well that many poor women are very clumsy and inefficient when it comes to a question of ordinary nice sewing, such as ladies like to have on their garments.

"My mother is a beautiful sewer, Miss Geraldine," answered Madge, confidently. "Then I'll see that she is constantly supplied, and you need not be worried about the rent, Madge. I wish you could learn to carry every one of your worries and anxieties right to the heavenly Father. You know how tenderly and truly he cares for us, and how, always whatever happens, we have an Elder Brother, who never forgets to love and keep us. If you would only come to him, dear, and find rest."

Then ensued a very sacred and confidential talk; when it ended Madge's eyes were wet, but the pale, strained look had gone from her face. She had found her Saviour, and never again would she be alone or friendless.

"Ma thought you wouldn't come to Sunday School on such a fearful day," she whispered, "but I knew you would, and I'm thankful I believe in you, Miss Geraldine. I am going to believe just that way in the Lord Jesus."

"Only more so," said Miss Geraldine, reverently and repentantly, with an inaudible prayer for pardon to the Loving One, whom she had so nearly, through a temptation to self-indulgence, wounded in the house of his friends.

"Madge," she said, "we must both pray daily for strength to resist the evil, and cling to the good."

Then Mr. Holly's sharp, incisive bell rang out its peremptory summons, and presently the school was in order, and they were hearing reports, and answering review questions, and singing for the final hymns, "More Love to Thee, O Christ," and "God be with you till we meet again."

Madge went home, and all the path before her was light and smooth, for a new courage had been born in her heart. By her faith in the teacher friend, and by that friend's fidelity, she had been led to the highest and best Friend in the universe, the Friend who never fails his own in any strait, who guides them to the end, and through eternity.

Geraldine was leaving the school-room, when Mr. Holly joined her. "Let me assist you," he said, "The wind is so strong and fierce, I fear you cannot hold your umbrella." That day he entered into relations which constituted him her comrade and protector through life.

The Structure of the Bible.*

THE Old Testament was composed by many distinct writers, at many different times, and in many separate portions, through a period of more than a thousand years, from Moses to Malachi. It is not, however, an aggregate of detached productions without order or method, but the seemingly casual circumstances connected with the origin of its several parts might tempt some to imagine. . . . There is a divine reason why every part is what it is and where it is; why God spake to his fathers at precisely those sundry times and in just those divers portions, in which he actually revealed his will. And, though it may not in every instance be ascertainable by us, yet careful and reverent study will disclose it not only in its general outlines, but also in a multitude of its minor details; and will show that the dispositions and alterations which have been proposed as improvements, are dislocations and disfigurements, which mar and disfigure the well-proportioned whole. . . . And those Israel from among the nations of the earth to be his own peculiar people, to train them up for himself by immediate communications of his will, and by manifestations of his presence and power in the midst of them. And as the first step in this process, first not only in the order of the law but of rational arrangement, and the foundation of the whole, he entered into a special and formal covenant with them at Sinai, and gave them a divine constitution and laws containing the undeveloped seeds and germs of all that he designed to accomplish in them and for them. The first division of the Old Testament consequently is the Pentateuch, which contains this law with its historical introduction. The next step was to engage the people to the observance of the law thus given to them. The constitution which they had received was set in operation and allowed to work out its legitimate fruits among them and upon them. The law of God thus shaped the history of Israel: while the history added confirmation and enlargement to the law by the experience which afforded of its workings and of the providential sanctions which attended it and the modifications which were from time to time introduced as occasion demanded. The historical books thus constitute the second division of the Old Testament, whose office it is to record the providential application and expansion of the law. A third step in this divine training was to have the law as originally given and as providentially expanded, wrought not only to the outward practice of the people or their national life, as shown in the historical books, but into their inward individual life and their intellectual convictions. This is the function of the poetical books, which are occupied with devout meditations or earnest reflections upon the law of God, his works and his providence, and the reproduction of the law in the heart and life. These form accordingly the third division of the Old Testament. The law has thus been set to work upon the national life of the people of Israel in the course of their history, and is in addition coming to be wrought more and more to their individual life and experience by devout meditation and careful reflection. But that this outward and inward development, though conducted in the one sense under immediate divine superintendence, and in the other under the inspiration of the Divine Spirit, might not fail of its pointed end, there was need that this should be held up to view and that the minds of the people should be constantly directed forward to it. With this view the prophets were raised up to reiterate, unfold, and apply the law in its true spiritual meaning, to correct abuses and misapprehensions, to recall a transgressing people to fidelity to their covenant God, and to expand to the full dimensions of the glorious future the germs and seeds of a better era which their covenant relation to Jehovah contained. They furnish thus what may be called an objective expansion of the law, and their writings form the last division of the Old Testament.

*From The Higher Criticism of the Pentateuch, by William Henry Green, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Oriental Literature in Princeton Theological Seminary. Prof. Green has a basis of operations in the differences existing between the theories of the higher Critics, and he is singularly well qualified to make the most of it in advocating the orthodox view of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. N. Y., 1894; price $1.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Turkish Vandalism.*

SULEYMAN I., surnamed by the Ottomans, Kanouni, or Law Giver; and by the Europeans, the Magnificent, ascended the throne at the age of twenty-three. The funeral of his father, Sultan Selim, took place on his arrival.

After his accession to the throne, he distributed the customary bakshish to the Janizaries, reducing it to one-third of the usual amount, and increased the compensation of his army. He returned the confiscated goods of the Persian merchants, and allowed them to remain.

In September, 1526, Sultan Suleyman the Magnificent entered the cities of Buda and Pesth without any resistance, where 100,000 Christians, men, women and little children were taken to Constantinople and sold in the Avrat-Bazaar, or Turkish slave market, and after a life of tyranny and suffering they passed into the grave, far from home and kindred. The treasures of the palace of Mathias Corvinus and its famous library were conveyed to the Seraglio in Constantinople. The Sultan proclaimed John Zappolio governor of Buda-Pesth, and returned to Constantinople, but in 1528 he marched again against Hungary, in consequence of the expulsion of Zappolio by Ferdinand, the King of Austria.

In May of the following year, Suleyman, with an army of 250,000 troops and 300 guns, arrived at Buda; on the way he met John Zappolio with his suite. The city, after five days' resistance, yielded, and the Turks for a few days luxuriated in their own fashion, indulging in riots and brutal outrages. Finally Zappolio was officially proclaimed king.

The Sultan marched against Vienna, which was besieged for fifteen days; its brave garrison consisting of 20,000 men and seventy-two guns repulsed all the assaults of the Ottomans, and on the night of the 14th of October the besiegers were compelled to withdraw on account of severe cold and lack of provisions.

*From The Ottoman Dynasty, by Alexander W. Hidden. The author is a native of Constantinople, and has spent forty years of his life in Turkey. His book gives a concise history of the Sultans of Turkey from the foundation of the dynasty to the present day. Pp. 229. Handsomely illustrated. Cloth covers. Published by Nicholas W. Hidden, New York.

THE ISLAND OF LEPERS.

JOHN D. MUSICK, the well known historical and descriptive author, who is now journeying around the world, gives this account of a visit he paid to the leper island of Molokai, in Hawaii: We cast anchor off Molokai near the settlement of Kalaupapa. At breakfast we began to disembark. Before leaving the ship, we were provided with a pair of new white kid gloves, and admonished to wear them all the time we were on shore. As we left the island next day in the boats for the ship, these gloves were thrown into the sea. From three to five hundred men gathered on the shore of Molokai to greet us, and others were coming over the hill, some on foot and many on horseback, waving hats and bonnets, and shouting like ship-wrecked mariners at the approach of rescuing boats. I had heard of lepers, and heard much about them, but I thought as I saw them from the boat that if these were lepers, they were a jolly set, over whom the cares of life sat lightly. A nearer approach dispelled the illusion that these unfortunates could be happy, and proved their cheerfulness to be only assumed. An old man sat in his house gazing at us, without a finger on either hand. A woman with two great tumors hanging from her chin, face covered with blotches, frightful to behold, was standing near. Even the band boys with their brilliant uniforms and beautiful muskets would not bear close inspection. Some of the lost part of their fingers, others their eyes, while the faces of all were more or less marred by the disease. Misery was depicted on every side. Doomed to hopeless isolation from the rest of the world, afflicted by an incurable disease, how could they be otherwise than miserable? The lepers came as close to us as they dared, and gazed on us with admiration which almost amounted to worship. To them we were superior beings with whom they could never mingle, yet whom they loved without any of the spirit of envy. They seemed never to tire of feasting their eyes on us.

Mr. Reynolds, the manager of the settlement, took us to the house set apart for visitors. The cook and steward of the ship brought some food ashore for our dinners. The lepers to the number of three hundred followed us to the house, and, in fact, everywhere we went that they were always surrounded and followed by them. The settlement at Kalaupapa is made up of more than one hundred small, clean houses for the lepers, and the land extending over to the other side of the tongue of land is lined with houses, barns, and gardens.

The Red Sea Miracle.

For several years past Major-General Havelock has been making government surveys for the English government in that part of Egypt where the Hebrews accomplished their famous journey. He has lately published a report which substantiates the Biblical story of the Red Sea passage. In his published statement he says that in the spring of last year he was engaged in surveying the borders of Lake Enzaleh, on the Red Sea. On one occasion a sudden and violent wind-storm arose, the force of which was so prodigious as to carry everything before it, including incidentally the water of the lake. In a few hours the whole body of water had been abducted, and naught remained save shells, mud and sand. The vessels moored in the lake were stranded high and dry, with no water in sight. This is possibly what occurred in the days of Moses. It gives new interest to that famous history wherein is set forth the triumphant flight of the captives dry-shod through the way of waters, whose returning flood destroyed their oppressors. An examination of the various routes has demonstrated the fact that at many points the miraculous event could have taken place.

A Grand Painting of SWEET PEAS

A Superb Work of Art,—Size 13 x 16½ inches, in 14 Colors.

By the famous French Artist, PAUL DE LONGPRÉ.

The great artist visited FORDHOOK FARM during midsummer, when the large area of Sweet Peas gave rare beauty to our Trial Grounds. Amid these charming scenes, glowing with life and color and sweet with delicate perfume of Sweet Peas, the famous painter of nature caught the most elusive charms of leaf and flower, which he has transfigured in imperishable life to his painting. This matchless specimen of the highest art has been reproduced in fourteen colors, making a picture that for chaste elegance it would be impossible to overpraise. So faithful has been the work of the lithographer that not even a trained critic could detect the difference from the original (which cost $250.00), except by the minutest examination.

It is indeed a rare transcript from nature,—a dream in colors that should adorn the walls of every home in town and country.

In order that all may secure a copy of this dainty work of art we will sell it to our customers) at 10 cents per copy, mailed in a pasteboard tube; regular price 20 cents.

With every copy we mail an illustrated KEY giving the name of each beautiful variety of Sweet Peas. This KEY is a most valuable possession. We offer The Artist's Blend of Sweet Peas, consisting of the most beautiful proportions of all the separate named varieties which Mr. De Longpré selected for his pasting-out of our collection of nearly one hundred varieties of Sweet Peas. Each packet costs 25 cents; 10 packets, per box $1.00, postpaid.

For One Dollar you can select either five Gem Collections, five Collections of Sweet Peas, or five full-size packets (or ten half-size packets) of CUPID, or equal value, assorted as desired. We sell all seeds in PACKETS to the value of $1.25 for each $1.00.

"FLOWERS FOR EVERY HOME."

This new book tells how to grow successfully flowers from seed, both indoors and out. It has been written by F. D. DAVENPORT, who has been for many years the general superintendent of the trial grounds of our famous FORDHOOK FARM, where are grown annually a greater variety of flowers from seed than anywhere else in America. Few writers have had such opportunities to learn flowers, and what he knows the author tells in language that can be easily understood. Illustrated; price 10 cents, postpaid.

subjects. Their flight over the snowy mountains has been accomplished in a most inclement season, and many have reached Persia barefooted and nearly naked, almost all being utterly destitute and thankful to have escaped death under the swords of the savage Kurds. At Urumia, where large numbers of these exiles have arrived, Mr. W. W. Howard, Commissioner, previous to beginning his return journey to the United States, organized a CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee, composed entirely of American missionaries, for the purpose of aiding the refugees, who number the Christian residents of Urumia. Mr. Jos. P. Cochran, the well-known missionary, was chosen as superintendent of the relief work, with associates as follows: the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Labaree, the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. William A. Shedd, the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Frederick G. Van, Mrs. J. H. Shedd, Miss Mary Van Duzee, Miss Harriet L. Dabney, Miss G. Russell, and Miss E. T. Miller. A remittance of $1000 has been sent by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund to Urumia by cable, through the Esbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, to be applied toward the work of the Relief Committee. The Armenians in Persia form a much smaller portion of the population than they do in Turkey. The mass of the general population are Mohammedans of the Shia sect, who are bitter enemies of the Sunni Mohammedans of Turkey. In one respect the condition of the Armenians in Persia has been inferior to that of their brethren under the Sultan. Socially they are more ostracized; the tenets of the Shiah lead them to regard Christians as unclean, and intimate association with them or partaking of their food and drink as defiling. Even yet, though the feeling is much modified, many Shiah exercise the greatest care not to come in contact with a Christian on a rainy day, and refuse to shelter the storm-beaten traveler.

Politically, the condition of Persian Armenians is comfortable. Oppression from landlords is frequent, murder and violation too often unpunished, but for the most part they can lead quiet and peaceful lives under the rule of the Shah, and are more prosperous financially than their Mohammedan neighbors. In recognition of their freedom from the conditions of their brethren in Turkey, the Armenians of Tabriz lately sent to a telegram, through their Bishop, expressing their gratitude to his majesty, the Shah.

The religious condition of the Armenians of Persia is not favorable. They are under the jurisdiction of the Bishops residing at Tabriz and Ispahan. The former is the Bishop of Azerbaijan, the northwestern province of Persia, the most populous and fertile portion of the kingdom. The latter has a diocese covering the rest of Persia and India. The Bishops are men of fair wrong: their influence for religious enlightenment is slight. The people fail to receive of them have given their lives in times past rather than deny their faith, even as

VAN, February 24, 1896. The need of relief is steadily increasing. We are now helping Sixteen thousand refugees daily here. We have sent a Relief Expedition, with $600.00, to Shadagh, to begin work there, where there is great suffering. Five hundred dollars have also been sent to Ardjiss. These two districts aggregate some fifty villages, and the greatest distress prevails. The scanty winter provision of most families, in both cities and villages, is exhausted, or soon will be. They have no possible resource, save through the Relief work. This alone prevents a famine. Six "Christian Herald" bakeries are now running steadily. There are one hundred employees in the Industrial Bureau, which is doing good work. The present relief work must continue at least two months longer. KIMBALL.

proper religious instruction, and are sadly deficient in knowledge of Christian truth and Church doctrines. This is especially true in the villages and mountain regions. There is often a striking contrast to this in the Mohammedan villagers, who by the constant efforts of their Mollahs and the services of the mosques, especially during the months of fasting and mourning, are many of them to-day suffering indescribable tortures and going to death, crying out, "Der Hesus. Der Hesus!" (Jesus Christ) rather than accept Islam. While giving all due credit and praise to the Armenians for their heroic fortitude, an observer cannot be blind to the fact that during these ages, the faith has been covered by many traditions, superstitions, and perverted practices, and that they need anew instruction in the principles of vital Christianity, a re-

They are so engrossed in the secular affairs of their dioceses and in the settlement of civil suits of their parishioners that they give little attention to moral or spiritual interests. Their influence as the civil heads of the Armenians is powerful for their protection from oppression and

THE SHEEP ASTRAY.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Isaiah 53: 6, "All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all."

NCE more I ring the old Gospel bell. The first half of my next text is an indictment: All we, like sheep, have gone astray. Some one says: "Can't you drop that first word? that is too general; that sweeps too great a circle." Some man rises in the audience and he looks over on the opposite side of the house, and says: "There is a blasphemer; and I understand how he has gone astray. And there in another part of the house is a defaulter, and he has gone astray. And there is an impure person, and he has gone astray." Sit down, my brother, and look at home. My text takes us all in. It starts behind the pulpit, sweeps the circuit of the room, and comes back to the point where it started, when it says, All we, like sheep, have gone astray. I can very easily understand why Martin Luther threw up his hands after he had found the Bible and cried out, "Oh! my sins, my sins!" and why the publican, according to the custom to this day in the East, when they have any great grief, began to beat himself and cry, as he smote upon his breast, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." I was, like many of you, brought up in the country, and I know some of the habits of sheep, and how they get astray, and what my text means when it says: "All we, like sheep, have gone astray." Sheep get astray in two ways: either by trying to get into other pasture, or from being scared by the dogs. In the former way some of us got astray. We thought the religion of Jesus Christ put us on short commons. We thought there was better pasturage somewhere else. We thought if we could only lie down on the banks of a distant stream, or under great oaks on the other side of some hill, we might be better fed. We wanted other pasturage than that which God, through Jesus Christ, gave our soul, and we wandered on, and we wandered on, and we were lost. We wanted bread, and we found garbage. The farther we wandered, instead of finding rich pasturage, we found blasted heath and sharper rocks and more stinging nettles. No pasture. How was it in the clubhouse when you lost your child? Did they come around and help you very much? Did your worldly associates console you very much? Did not the plain Christian man who came into your house and sat up with your darling child give you more comfort than all worldly associates? Did all the convivial songs you ever heard comfort you in that time of grief? Did the hymns that were sung by your little child the last Sabbath morning comfort you?

Did your business associates in that day of darkness and trouble give you any special condolence? Business exasperated you, business wore you out, business left you limp as a rag, business made you mad. You got dollars, but you got no peace. God have mercy on the man who has nothing but business to comfort him! The world afforded you no luxuriant pasturage. A famous English actor stood on the stage impersonating, and thunders of applause came down from the galleries, and many thought it was the proudest moment of all his life; but there was a man asleep just in front of him, and the fact that that man was indifferent and somnolent spoiled all the occasion for him, and he cried: "Wake up, wake up!" So one little annoyance in life has been more pervading to your mind than all the brilliant congratulations and success. Poor pasturage for your soul you find in this world. The world has cheated you, the world has belied you, the world has misinterpreted you, the world has persecuted you. It never comforted you. Oh! this world is a good rack from which a horse may pick his food; it is a good trough from which the swine may crunch their mess; but it gives but little food to a soul blood-bought and immortal. What is a soul? It is a hope high as the throne of God. What is a man? You say, "It is only a man." It is only a man gone overboard in sin. It is only a man gone overboard in business life. What is a man? The battle ground of three worlds, with his hands taking hold of destinies of light or darkness. A man! No line can measure him. No limit can bound him. The archangel before the throne cannot outlive him. The stars shall die, but he will watch their extinguishment. The world will burn, but he will gaze at the conflagration. Endless ages will march on; he will watch the procession. A man! The masterpiece of God Almighty. Yet you say, "It is only a man." Can a nature like that be fed on husks of the wilderness?

Substantial comfort will not grow.
On barrenness barrenness will;
All we can trust till Christ we know,
That is the truth.

Some of you got astray by looking for better pasturage; others by being scared of the dogs. The hound gets over into the pasture-field. The poor things fly in every direction. In a few moments they are torn of the hedges and they are plashed of the ditch, and the lost sheep never gets home unless the farmer goes after it. There is nothing so thoroughly lost as a lost sheep. It may have been in 1857, during the financial panic, or during the financial stress in the Fall of 1873 when you got astray. You almost became an atheist. You said, "Where is God, that honest men go down and thieves prosper?" You were dogged of creditors, you were dogged of the banks, you were dogged of worldly disaster, and some of you went into misanthropy, and some of you took to strong drink, and others of you fled out of Christian association, and you got astray. Oh! man, that was the last time when you ought to have forsaken God. Standing amid the foundering of your earthly failures, how could you get along without a God to comfort you, and a God to deliver you, and a God to help you, and a God to save you? You tell me you have been through enough business trouble almost to kill you. I know it. I cannot understand how the boat could live one hour in that chopped sea. But I do not know by what process you got astray; some in one way and some in another, and if you could really see the position some of you occupy before God your soul would burst into an agony of tears and you would pelt the heavens with the cry, "God have mercy!" Sinai's batteries have been unlimbered above your soul, and at times you have heard it thunder, "The wages of sin is death." "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God." "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." When Sebastopol was being bombarded, two Russian frigates burned all night in the harbor, throwing a glare upon the trembling fortress; and some of you, from what you have told me yourselves, some of you are standing in the night of your soul's trouble, the cannonade, and the conflagration, and the multiplication, and the multitude of your sorrows and troubles I think must make the wings of God's hovering angels shiver to the tip.

But the last part of my text opens a door wide enough to let us all out and to let all heaven in. Sound it on the organ with all the stops out. Thrum it on the harps with all the strings atune. With all the melody possible let the heavens sound it to the earth and let the earth tell it to the heavens. "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." I am glad that the prophet did not stop to explain whom he meant by "him." Him of the manger, him of the bloody sweat, him of the resurrection throne, him of the crucifixion agony. "On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all." "Oh!" says some man, "that isn't generous, that isn't fair; let every man carry his own burden and pay his own debts." That sounds reasonable. If I have an obligation and I have the means to meet it and I come to you and ask you to settle that obligation, you rightly say, "Pay your own debts." If you and I, walking down the street—both hale, hearty and well—I ask you to carry me, you say rightly, "Walk on your own feet!" But suppose you and I were in a regiment, and I was wounded in the battle and I fell unconscious at your feet with gunshot fractures and dislocations, what would you do? You would call to your comrades, saying, "Come and help, this man is helpless; bring the ambulance; let us take him to the hospital" and I would be a dead lift in your arms, and you would lift me from the ground where I had fallen, and put me in the ambulance and take me to the hospital and have all kindness shown me. Would there be anything bemeaning in my accepting that kindness? Oh! no. You would be mean not to do it. That is what Christ does. If we could pay our debts, then it would be better to go up and pay them, saying, "Here, Lord, here is my obligation; here are the means with which I mean to settle that obligation; now give me a receipt, cross it all out." The debt is paid. But the fact is we have fallen in the battle, we have gone down under the hot fire of our transgressions, we have been wounded by the sabres of sin, we are helpless, we are undone. Christ comes. The loud clang heard in the sky on that Christmas night was only the bell, the resounding bell of the ambulance. Clear the way for the Son of God. He comes down to bind up the wounds, and to scatter the darkness, and to save the lost. Clear the way for the Son of God. Christ comes down to us, and we are a dead lift. He does not lift us with the tips of his fingers. He does not lift us with one arm. He comes down upon his knee, and then with a dead lift he raises us to honor and glory and immortality. "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." Why, then, will a man carry his sins? You cannot carry successfully the smallest sin you ever committed. You might as well put the Appennines on one shoulder and the Alps on the other. How much less can you carry all the sins of your lifetime. Christ comes and looks down in your face and says: "I have come through all the lacerations of these days, and through a the tempests of these nights; I have come to bear your burdens, and to pardon your sins, and to pay your debts; put them on my shoulder, put them on my heart." "On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all." Sin has almost pestered the life out of some of you. At times it has made you cross and unreasonable, and it has spoiled the brightness of your days and the peace of your night. There are men who have been riddled with sin. The world gives them no solace. Gossamery and volatile the world, which eternally, as they look forward to it, black as midnight. They writhe under the stings of a conscience which proposes to give no rest here and no rest hereafter and yet they do not repent, they do not pray, they do not weep. They do not realize that just the position they occupy—the position occupied by scores, hundreds and thousands of men who never found any hope.

If this meeting should be thrown open and the people who are here could give their testimony, what thrilling experience we should hear on all sides! There is a man who would say: "I had brilliant surroundings; I had the best education that one of the best collegiate institutions of this country could give, and I observed all the moralities of life, and I was so righteous, and I thought I was all right before God as I am all right before me, but the Holy Spirit came to me one day and said, 'You are a sinner;' the Holy Spirit persuaded me of the fact. While he had escaped the sins against the law of the land, I had really committed the worst of a man ever commits, the driving back the Son of God from my heart's affection and I saw that my hands were red with the blood of the Son of God, and I began to pray, and peace came to my heart, and I know by experience that what you say is true." "On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all!" Yonder is a man who would say, "I was the worst drunkard in the city; I went from bad to worse. I destroyed myself; I destroyed my home; my children cowered when I entered the house; when they put up their lips to kiss I struck them; when my wife protested against the maltreatment, I kicked her into the street. I know all the brutality and all the terrors of a drunkard's woe. I went on further and further from God until one day I got a letter, saying:

"MY DEAR HUSBAND: I have tried every way, done everything and prayed earnestly and fervently for your reformation, but seems of no avail. Since our little Henry died with the exception of those few happy weeks when you remained sober, my life has been one of sorrow. Many of the nights I have by the window, with my face bathed in tears, watching for your coming. I am broken-hearted, I am sick. Mother and father have been here frequently and begged me to come home, but my love for you and my hope for bright days have always made me refuse them. I hope seems now beyond realization, and I have returned to them. It is hard, and I have tied long before doing it. May God bless and preserve you, and take from you that accursed appetite, and hasten the day when we shall be again living happily together. This will be my daily prayer, knowing that he has said, 'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' For your loving wife, MARY."

"And so I wandered on and wandered on," says that man, "until one night I passed a Methodist meeting-house, and I said to myself, 'I'll go in and see what they are doing,' and I got to the door, and they were singing,

"All may come whoever will—
This man receives poor sinners still!"

And I dropped right there where I was, and I said, 'God have mercy!' and he laid mercy on me. My home is restored, my wife sings all day long during work, my children come out a long way to greet me home, and my household is a little heaven. I will tell you what did all this for me. It was the truth that this day you aim: 'On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all.' Yonder is a woman who would say, 'I wandered off from my father's house. I heard the storm that elts on a lost soul; my feet were blistered in the hot rocks. I went on and on, thinking that no one cared for my soul, when one night Jesus met me, and he said, 'Poor thing, go home; your father is waiting for you, your mother is waiting for you. Go home, poor thing.' And, sir, I was too weak to pray, and I was too weak to repent, but I just cried out—I sobbed out my sins and my sorrows on the shoulders of him of whom it is said, 'the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.'"

There is a young man who would say: I had a Christian bringing up; I came from the country to city life; I started well; I had a good position—a good commercial position—but one night at the theatre, I met some young men who did me no good. They dragged me all through the sewers of iniquity, and I lost my morals, and I lost my position, and I was habby and wretched. I was going down the street, thinking that no one cared for me, when a young man tapped me on the shoulder and said: 'George, come with me and I will do you good. I looked at him to see whether he was joking or not. I saw he was in earnest, and I said, 'What do you mean, sir?' 'Well,' he replied, 'I mean that if you will come to the meeting to-night, I will be very glad to introduce you. I will meet you at the door. Will you come?' Said I, 'I will.' I went to the place where I was tarrying. I fixed myself up as well as I could. I buttoned my coat over a ragged vest, and I went to the door of the church, and the young man met me, and we went in, and as I went in, I heard an old man praying, and he looked so much like my father, I sobbed right out, and they were all around, so kind and so sympathetic, that I just there gave my heart to God, and I know that what you say is true; I know it in my own experience." "On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all." Oh, my brother, without stopping to look whether your hand trembles or not, without stopping to look whether your hand is bloated with sin or not, put it in my hand and let me give you one warm, brotherly, Christian grip, and invite you right up to the heart, to the compassion, to the sympathy, to the pardon of him on whom the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all. Throw away your sins. Carry them no longer. I proclaim emancipation to all who are bound, pardon for all sin and eternal life for all the dead.

Some one comes here to-day and I stand aside. He comes up three steps. He comes to this place. I must stand aside. Taking that place he spreads abroad his hands, and they were nailed. You see his feet: they were bruised. He pulls aside the robe and shows you his wounded heart. I say: "Art thou weary?" "Yes," he says, "Weary with the world's woe." I say: "Whence comest thou?" He says: "I came from Calvary." I say: "Who comes with thee?" He says: "No one; I have trodden the wine-press alone." I say: "Why comest thou here?" "Oh!" He says, "I came here to carry all the sins and sorrows of the people." And he kneels. He says: "Put on my shoulders all the sorrows and all the sins." And, conscious of my own sins first, I take them and put them on the shoulders of the Son of God. I say: "Canst thou bear any more, oh, Christ?" He says: "Yes, more." And I gather up the sins of all those who serve at these altars, the officers of the church of Jesus Christ—I gather up all their sins and I put them on Christ's shoulders, and I say: "Canst thou bear any more?" He says: "Yes, more." Then I gather up all the sins of a hundred people in this house and I put them on the shoulders of Christ, and I say: "Canst thou bear more?" He says: "Yea, more." And I gather up all the sins of this assembly, and put them on the shoulders of the Son of God, and I say: "Canst thou bear them?" "Yea," he says,

"more." But he is departing. Clear the way for him, the Son of God. Open the door and let him pass out. He is carrying our sins and bearing them away. We shall never see them again. He throws them down into the abyss, and you hear the long-reverberating echo of their fall. "On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all." Will you let him take your sins today? or, do you say, "I will take charge of them myself, I will fight my own battles, I will risk eternity on my own account?" I know not how near some of you have come to crossing the line. A clergyman said in his pulpit one Sabbath: "Before next Saturday night one of this audience will have passed out of life." A gentleman said to another seated next to him: "I don't believe it; I mean to watch, and if it doesn't come true by next Saturday night, I shall tell that clergyman his falsehood." The man seated next to him said: "Perhaps it will be yourself." "Oh! no," the other replied: "I shall live to be an old man." That night he breathed his last. To-day the Saviour calls. All may come. God never pushes a man off. God never destroys anybody. The man jumps off, he jumps off. It is suicide—soul suicide—if the man perishes, for the invitation is, "whosoever will, let him come," whosoever, whosoever, whosoever!

Woe to the sinners, how short the days,
How sweet the time, how precious the hour;

While yet a pardoning God is found.

many are coming into the kingdom of God, join the procession heavenward.

Seated in my church was a man who came in who said: "I don't know that there is any God." "That was on Friday night. I said: 'We will kneel down and find out whether there is any God.' And in the second seat from the pulpit we knelt. He said: 'I have found him. There is a God, a pardoning God. I feel him here.' He knelt in the darkness of sin. He arose two minutes afterward in the liberty of the Gospel; while another sitting under the gallery on Friday night, said, 'My opportunity is gone; last week I might have been saved; not now; the door is shut.' 'Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world.' 'Now is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation.' 'It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after that the judgment!'"

An Eastern Legend.

There is a legend which tells of two angels—the Angel of Requests and the Angel of Thanksgiving, leaving Heaven to gather the petitions of men to be carried up to God. Each had a great basket in his hand. The Angel of Requests soon had his basket so filled that he could scarcely carry it, while the basket of the Angel of Thanksgiving was almost empty. God hears a great many cries for help and pleadings for favors, but not so many glad voices of praise. Of ten lepers who were healed only one returned to give thanks.

So it is with most of us: we eagerly flee to God when we need help and call upon him for deliverance and for relief, but when the blessing we sought is given to us, how many of us return to God to thank him for the good things he has done for us?

AN AMPHIBIOUS STEAMER.

WHAT is certainly one of the most remarkable inventions of this practical age of ours, is shown in the illustration on this page from the Illustrated London News. In view of the fact that inter-oceanic canals are very expensive affairs, and that not all the projected canals are likely ever to be carried to completion, it occurred to Mr. J. C. Magnell, a Swedish engineer, that some system might be devised which would aid in solving at once both the financial and engineering difficulties. His labors have demonstrated that a steamship can be so constructed as to be propelled on land as well as on the water without much difficulty.

The steamer when on land, runs on rails just as a train does, the motive power being the same that turns the propeller. Mr. Magnell's steamer is called the Swan, and is now at work in the northern part of the island of Zealand, in Denmark. It performs its journey ten times daily, and crosses the intervening isthmus of dry land in a perfectly satisfactory manner every time. The little amphibious boat is about fifty feet long and nine feet in the beam, draws about three feet of water, and can accommodate seventy persons. The engines are of twenty-seven horse-power, and work the

THE GOSPEL IN CHINA.

WRITING from Yunnan, Rev. S. Pollard, a missionary, gives an interesting description of open-air gospel services there. He says:

There are scores of places, and the missionary is quite embarrassed

AN OPEN-AIR SERVICE AT YUNNAN.

with the number of stands which offer attractions for open-air preaching. You can find wide, open spaces in front of most of the Yamen and temples. The streets are wider than in many parts of China, and you can often get a good stand in front of an empty shop. No one interferes. Sometimes the crowd gathers so quickly that no preliminaries are needed, and you can begin preaching right away. Mere frequently a hymn or a short overture on the concertina is needed to start the proceedings. The Chinese are very fond of music of a kind. They are very fond of mine. They were so fond of the very first tune I played that I never learnt another. How many thousands of people that tune has put into a good humor and prepared for a sympathetic listening to the preaching after! The tune is a mixture of my own! Many missionaries find it a great help to give the Chinese something to look at as well as listen to when preaching to them. Dr. Wilson has rendered great service to many of us by preparing several series of native drawings. As a rule the people listen well, especially so if the preacher is acquainted with their everyday language. What a privilege it is to be able to tell the old, old story in a very old language! These people are not Gospel-hardened, at any rate. They don't know just what you are going to say before you start. They can't tell you the end of the story of Daniel in the Den as soon as you have finished the first sentence. The beautiful narrative of Lazarus and his sisters at Bethany is all new to the listeners, and has all the charm of a new story. I never thought these stories were so beautiful till I told them to people who had never heard them before. What must the incidents have been to those who saw them enacted the very first time? The natives are a great help in open-air preaching. When the love of Jesus fills a Chinaman's heart you may be sure he will want to preach. I have heard some of them preach beautifully and at great length. I have known one missionary who would preach so long that at last his audience would disappear. Then the missionary ceased, to have, let us hope, an after-meeting alone. The Chinese Christians will often preach as long as this missionary did, but with this difference—the audience remains."

Dr. Paton's Visit to Tongoa.

In a recent letter Rev. Oscar Michelson reports a visit of Rev. Dr. Paton to the beautiful little island of Tongoa, New Hebrides. He says: "No day in the history of this mission can be compared with the day when I baptised seventy-two men and women. A fortnight afterwards we had communion, when 128 of us (185 natives) partook of the divine emblems. I need hardly say what such an event was to me. The service was conducted at the very spot where the heathen images stood when I came to the island."

Teaching About Prayer.

Sunday School Lesson for March 15, Luke 11: 1-13. Golden Text, Luke 11: 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

TWICE over, during the days of his ministry upon earth, the Lord Jesus taught his disciples what is usually called, "The Lord's Prayer." The first occasion was in the course of his Sermon on the Mount, when he showed the difference between real and unreal prayer. He taught that true communing of the child of God with his Father, seeks privacy, and has its reward in the very fact of his meeting with God, while the ostentatious prayer of the unreal Jew, or the vain repetitions of the heathen have their reward only in being "seen of men." And Jesus introduces the Lord's Prayer here with the words, "After this manner therefore pray ye," and his only comment at the close is on the point of forgiveness. "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses."

If the disciples had learned what Jesus then taught them, how came it to pass "as he was praying in a certain place, that, when he ceased, one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples?" Had they learned as though they did not learn? Until the Lord had poured out his life, and the Holy Ghost had been given on the day of Pentecost, he to them his own divine nature, "life and incorruption." The corn of wheat must fall into the ground and die, that there might be a harvest of like nature with his own. (John 12: 24). The disciples were still under the Old Testament regime: "precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little" (Isa. 28: 10); they had yet to know the power of an endless life. (Heb. 7: 16). On this occasion the teaching of the Lord is more elementary than on the former occasion. Instead of saying, "After this manner therefore pray ye," etc., he now says, "When ye pray, say," etc., and his comment is directed to teach, by illustration and precept, that God is to be trusted, and that his Fatherly love will never fail a really trusting child.

He draws a strong contrast between a friend, from whom help is claimed, and a father. Ordinary friendship will not stand the strain of much personal inconvenience. A friend comes at the most inconvenient hour, at midnight. All the lights in the house are extinguished; the cupboards are locked, everyone is in bed; and the friend makes a demand which will turn night into day with a whole household, because an unexpected friend on a journey has come to him and found him without provision. He meets with anything but a welcome; the friend whose help he seeks needs his sleep, and thinks the other ought to be more considerate, to keep provision in his house, and not to inconvenience other people at such ill-timed hours. "Trouble me not," is his reply, "the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot rise and give." But the friend with a reasonable request is disappointed, and the disturbed householder can get no more sleep. At last he is conquered by his friend's pertinacity, thinks his best policy is to grant the request in self-defense, "because of his importunity."

Such is human friendship when it does not spring out of Divine union in the Spirit. The picture is not imaginary. Selfish friendship is always selfish. Like water, it cannot rise above its level. But "Our Father which art in heaven," is himself Love; selfishness is foreign to him; he gives because he is a Father, and takes a Father's responsibility. "Therefore," continues our Lord, "I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Coming to God as to a Father, you run no risk of meeting such a rebuff as, "Trouble me not." Our Heavenly Father

Invites us to Come

at all times, and under all circumstances to him. "In nothing be anxious; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God." (Phil. 4: 6, R. V.); and the result will be that the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus." (Ver. 7.) Why? because no real prayer is in vain. "For everyone that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened."

God cannot fail us; he only asks his children to treat him as the Father he is, and his response will be as certain and as unlimited as he is himself. And he would have us realize fully this relationship, and asks, "Of which of you that is a father shall his son ask a loaf, and he give him a stone, or a fish, and he for a fish give him a serpent? Or if he shall ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Heavenly Father give good things (Matt. 7: 11), the Holy Spirit, (Luke 11: 13), to them that ask him?" (R. V.) Let us count on the true, unvarying fatherhood of our God, and apply to him for every need of Spirit, soul, and body; and our testimony will be, "They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing." (Ps. 34: 10.)

But it is to a Father we come, to our Elder and our Superior, as well as to our God. If we expect him to do a Father's part to us, we must to him. The relation between father and child is utterly wrong and demoralizing on both sides, where the child has the upper hand, and succeeds in worrying out of his father, by sheer importunity, that which is against his father's will and judgment to give, in the same spirit as the friend at midnight. The whole tenor of the Lord's Prayer places things in their right order. Our Father and his interests must of necessity come first, otherwise the position is not that of father and child, but simply of mendicant and benefactor. Many there are who complain that their prayers are not answered. They come with a strong, selfish desire for something on which they have set their hearts; and not being able to obtain it otherwise, they pray for it in a spirit of trying to make God minister to their own selfishness. God can be no party to such a transaction, and his silence is witness to the fact.

There are often cases of such as pray, even for power over sin, in a wrong spirit. They do not come and yield themselves wholly up to the direction and discipline of the Holy Spirit; they want to go their own way, which is often straight into known danger and temptation; and while in their own will, and holding the reins of their own life, they want to have God, as it were, act under them, just in the capacity of Keeper, as far as they desire. Is it conceivable that poor human nature can offer so grave an insult to the Most Holy God? Yet judging from the complaints that their prayers are not answered, we are driven to conclude that this is really the position of many.

Our elder Brother, the Lord Jesus Christ, who, as Man, realized to the full the authority and the dignity of our Father, taught us to pray before any personal petition: "Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come; thy will be done." This is the true spirit of sonship. True, it was a dead letter until the Holy Ghost came to dwell in the children of God who were yielded up to obey him. (Acts 5: 32.) But the prayer of the Church (Acts 4: 23-30), shows that in the days of Pentecost, disciples had learned to pray after the manner of the Lord's prayer, God's interests first. Filled with the Holy Ghost they prayed in the Spirit (Eph. 6: 18), and their prayer was abundantly answered.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

VERY word our Lord spoke is of moment to us, but these directions as to prayer, are of special importance. They furnish a model prayer and then give encouragement and cautions. The prayer itself is beautiful in its unadorned simplicity. Its opening words are peculiar to Christ. To the Jew, the idea of God was that of a great King and Lawgiver.

Christ revealed him as a Father. But would God resent our so approaching him? The prayer answers the question: "Our Father." Then we may assume that he has to us the feelings that a father has toward his children. But his majesty must not be forgotten. Reverence is expected and the next sentence emphasizes the fact: "Hallowed be thy name." Then comes the desire for the extension of God's kingdom. Why should we pray for it? Does not God rule now? Yes, but this is something different. It is the desire that men should obey him, that they should fulfil his commands. What a different world this would be if God were the acknowledged Ruler, with every man anxious to obey and honor him! When this prayer is uttered, some people are apt to forget what a change there would be in their lives and in all about them, if God's will were done here as it is in heaven. The petitions pass now to personal needs. Necessary provision for the body and forgiveness of sins, preservation from temptation and deliverance from evil. These, Christ considered, were the needs which men might take to their Heavenly Father. The illustration he used, is to serve directly as an encouragement to prayer. Even a man who has little disposition to grant a request, who thinks more of his own comfort than his friend's inconvenience, will yield if the friend is persistent. The lesson is the same as that of the unjust judge in Luke 18: 1-6. If such men as these will yield to importunity, how much more will God, who loves his children, be ready to give when the petitioner is really in earnest. "Ask and it shall be given you." May we then be sure of receiving whatever we ask? By no means. Christ has not finished his teaching. The Giver is like a father in another respect. He knows what is good for his child. The child asks bread, or fish, or an egg—good things that will nourish him. Those he will give, but he will not give what will not satisfy, nor what will do him harm. The child might in his ignorance choose something that looked like bread, but is really unsatisfying, or something that looked like a fish, but might injure him. That the father will not give. Neither will God give us things that we ask for, if he sees that they would do us harm. Many a man has earnestly prayed for riches, pleading the promise, when if he had received them, his soul would be impoverished and he would become worldly and wicked. God refuses him as the father would refuse the child who clamored for the scorpion, under the impression that it was an egg. So we get our lesson as to prayer. It should be reverent but loving, earnest but submissive to God's superior wisdom, and it should be in accord with our own conduct to others. As our judges in courts of equity tell suitors, "He who asks equity must do equity," so he who asks forgiveness must be forgiving, or he will not receive the blessing.

Lord, teach us to pray. When a traveler goes to Europe and is to be presented by our minister to some monarch, he asks some one familiar with the court to tell him how he should behave. He does not want to be servile, but he wants to know what the customs are, that he may not do anything that would be considered rude or lacking in becoming deference. What an opportunity of learning how to approach God this was, when God's own Son was here to tell us what God expects from us in coming into his presence!

When ye pray, say— The Lord's Prayer was once the means of disarming hostility. Two Christian travelers in Asia Minor were surrounded by a band of angry Mohammedans who, in a frenzy of religious excitement, denounced them as infidel dogs and rebels against Allah. One of the travelers who could speak Arabic came out of the tent and declared that the charge was false. "Hear my daily prayer," he said, "and judge for yourselves." He recited the Lord's Prayer. All stood silent in amazement to the end. Then the priest who had been leading the tumult said: "It is beautiful; I will never again curse a man who prays such a prayer. I beg thee repeat it that we may use it day by day."

Our Father. God is our Father, though some of us do not know all that the fact implies. A young man traveled with his father through Europe and into Asia. They were the only two in the party who spoke English. The young man, who spoke no other language, was dependent on his father for conversation. When he returned, he said, "I did not know my father until now. I knew that he was a good man, but until we were thrown together, and I talked with him day after day, I had no idea how good he was. It was a revelation and it has done me good." That is the experience of those who commune often with God.

As in heaven. The question was asked of a class of girls, "How is God's will done in heaven?" One replied: "It is done immediately;" another, "It is done diligently;" a third, "It is done always." There was silence for a minute, and then the youngest child in the class added, "It is done without asking questions."

We also forgive. Washington Gladden uses an illustration of this teaching. The desert, he says, is a desert because no rain falls upon it, but that is only half the truth. No rain falls upon it because it is a desert. The heated air rising from its arid surface disperses the moist vapors overhead, that otherwise would descend in rain. When there is moisture in the earth, then moisture will descend from heaven.

Because of his importunity. It is related of Whitefield, that being repeatedly urged to cross the Atlantic to preach in a place where a revival was urgently needed, he replied: "It is useless to urge me; I am on my Father's business. Appeal to him. If you are in such earnest as you say, you should pray to God and he would send me. I am in his hands; wherever he sends me I will go. Do not importune me; plead with my Master; he never refuses an earnest seeker."

To him that knocketh. A child in Jamaica came to the Mission school after a long absence. He said he had been very ill and had often wished his teacher knew of it that he might have come and prayed with him. The teacher said he wished he had, but he hoped the boy prayed for himself. The boy said he did. "How did you pray?" the teacher asked. "Why, sir, I just begged," was the lad's reply.

Every one that asketh receiveth. Not always in the form expected, but in some way the answer comes. An eminent writer pictures the young eaglet asking the eagle, "Teach me to fly." In answer the eagle tears the nest to pieces. It seems cruel but it answers the prayer for the eaglet must fly or die. So the prayer for faith may be answered by affliction that compels faith.

THE GOSPEL AMONG THE PINES.

Miss Emma C. Nason's Labors for the Benefit of the Lumbermen in the Logging Camps of the North West.

FEW months ago, the portrait of Miss Emma C. Nason appeared in these columns with a brief account of the effort she is making to send the Gospel to the lumbermen of Michigan, Wisconsin, and other States. Testimonials that have come to hand from clergymen and others who have seen the effects of this work show that a wonderful blessing has attended it and that there is urgent need for its continuance and extension.

It is probably not generally known how large a number of men are engaged in the logging industry. From one of the works in Wisconsin we learn that in that State alone the men who spend the winter in the logging camps number fully fifty thousand. They are drawn from all sections and are of many nationalities. Some camps are composed almost wholly of Canadians, others of Germans, others of Norwegians, but usually each camp is made up of representatives of all nationalities. They are chiefly men in the prime of life, though there are a large number of youths eighteen to twenty years of age. They are isolated during the winter, far from any church or Christian influence, though when then, evil influences reach them and the camp is often the scene of shocking crimes. When the Spring comes they are paid off and carry their earnings into the lumber towns of their district where the saloons, gambling houses and vicious resorts await their coming eagerly, and often end out regularly commissioned agents to solicit their patronage.

The woodsmen are usually engaged in November or early in December and are in the camp until late in the spring. They are generally accommodated in huts built of untrimmed logs, one large room serving as sitting-room, smoking-room and sleeping-room for fifty or sixty men. Connected with this camp is the kitchen and dining-room where they are fed when it appears that their work does not lie too far away for them to reach it for their mid-day meal. They are off to the forest before dawn and with the brief interval of twenty minutes for dinner they are toiling until sunset. In the evening they get substantial supper and the interval between that meal and sunset is given up to amusement. The most serious feature of the logging-camp to the Christian mind is this hour or two in the common room at night after the day's work is done. The men, withdrawn from the refining influences of home for six months of the year, show the natural result of their isolation. Too often they become coarse and degraded in speech and manner, and their talk and their songs are of the foulest type. The purveyors of vile literature, too, take advantage of their condition to market their pernicious wares and thus add fuel to the flame.

It is to these men that Miss Emma C. Nason is trying to send the Gospel message. Nearly seven years ago she began the work at her own cost by opening a mission to reach them as they returned to town after their winter's work. As friends heard of her effort and came to her assistance, she was able to extend her operations and latterly she has had the support of the King's Daughters. God blessed the attempt made in his name and among the converts was one lumberman who consecrated his life to Christian service. He went out from camp to camp, often trudging at some risk through the snow for long distances to visit the men in their evening hours and hold a simple service at which he would declare what God had done for his own soul. Other Evangelists, since then have been sent out through whom many souls have been won.

As far as her means would allow, Miss Nason has furnished these Gospel messengers with good literature as an antidote to the pernicious trash they generally found in the camps. She has also, with a woman's tact, devised a system of reaching the men through her now-famous system of "Comfort Bags." These bags contain a supply of needles, thread, buttons, bandages for wounds, and other matters likely to be in request among men at a distance from home and store. With these she put up a new Testament and book of Gospel songs. The "Comfort Bags" struck popular favor in the camps from the beginning, and the demand for them increases from year to year. The evangelists report that the songs are especially popular, and that in many camps they have completely displaced the music hall songs. Many a rough man remembers hearing the Gospel songs, and learning them as a boy at his mother's knee or in Sunday School, and they come to him as a message of tender and sacred associations. The New Testaments also are read, and it is not at all uncommon now to have a man appointed to read convert he wins ceases to contribute to their coffers when he ceases to live for the flesh and begins to live for the spirit. They therefore oppose the Evangelist by all means in their power and often threaten him with death. But no one has ever quitted the work through fear. One of the Evangelists sent out by the Mission, Mr. Alfred Smith, of Crunden, Wis., has this winter visited over two hundred camps in Michigan, composed of upward of eight thousand men and at some of his meetings he has had over a hundred men to hear him. One of the men, who was brought by the blessing of God on Mr. Smith's work to renounce sin and give himself to Christ, said that for twenty-five years he had not been inside a church.

In addition to this work of which the mission at Sault Ste Marie is the centre, branch stations have been opened at West Superior, Hurley and Ashland, Wis. Miss Nason's brother, Rev. J. H. Nason, has charge of these and has done a very extensive work. The forests at the back of West Superior extend for nearly a hundred miles and there and around Ashland the camps are large and numerous. At Hurley the work is pushed also among the miners who need its influence as badly as do the loggers. Mr. Nason has established in all three cities a regular mission with coffee-rooms, lodgings and reading rooms to enable men who coming in from the logging-camps and desiring to be kept out of temptation can find a refuge from evil associations. A Gospel meeting is held every night at each of these missions and many souls have been won there. Mr. Nason has never faltered in this work, though at times he has been sorely beset by the enemies of Christ who have tried desperate methods to drive him shall hear of her refuge and often at the risk of her life has penetrated the dens of infamy to encourage some miserable girl to leave and begin a new life. Respectable homes have been found for several of these girls, and in more than one instance Miss Nason has had the pleasure of arranging for a wedding in her home, where some logger who has renounced his sins and has resolved in Christ's strength to lead a clean Christian life, has invited one of the rescued girls to become his wife.

It is a busy, Christ-like life that this good lady is spending in this hard discouraging field. It has its dangers and one of these—that of an attempt to blow up her house with dynamite—was described in our former notice. She is happy in her labors, her only distress arising from the fact that she can do so little while the opportunities are so great. Her small means are altogether insufficient to extend her work as she would like to do. She earnestly begs for all the help that can be afforded. Any funds sent to this office for her we will gladly forward.

The Countess Evangelist.

In a recent address, the Countess Schimmelmenn, the Danish peeress, who has astonished her aristocratic friends by devoting herself to Christian work, described the motives that had impelled her to that course. She spoke of her early life, as a professing Christian craving after something real, but knowing nothing save the formal observances of the National Church and the daily round of Court etiquette and pageant. For years she was unsatisfied and longing. At length God revealed, not her love to Him, but his love to her. As this entered her soul, she found her views of things around changing. No more had the world, with all its pomp and parade, its etiquette and forms, attraction for her. She had found at length the One who alone can satisfy.

Since then she has known persecution, slander, loss of friends, cruel treatment, deprivation of liberty, but God has been with her and that has sufficed. Although heiress to great estates, she had at one time to walk alone with an old nurse from her ancestral castle, to the railway station with but a few coins in her pocket, an exile from home. Friends came forward offering aid, provided she would return to Court and worldly life—but she could not; and again she had to face cruel persecution. In the midst of it all God gave her the rest of his love, and that made up for all. Never had she imagined that any human heart could have the happiness which flooded and filled her soul.

Next came an account of the horror expressed when she, a Court lady—in a land where women were never supposed to speak in public—began to enter on Gospel service. At first she found openings among prisoners and the poor; but ere long was led to visit Rugen, an island on the northern coast of Pomerania. There she discovered that the poor fishermen were living in a half-wild condition, caring for little else than drinking and gambling. Finding how things stood, she resolved to make her home among them, sleeping in a miserable tavern and putting up with every possible inconvenience and deprivation to reach them. The work has spread over thirty villages and the whole character of the population has been changed.

In somewhat similar fashion she has gained in recent years entrance among the Socialists of Berlin, Hamburg and other cities. No matter how determined the opposition and savage the threats uttered, her calm unflinching faith in God, whose message she has been sent to speak and means to speak, seems to gain the day. Thus she has declared the Gospel of Divine grace in many socialistic halls and to vast audiences of Socialists.

No one can hear Countess Schimmelmenn without the persuasion that her whole soul is fired by the love of God, that her faith is singularly child-like and simple, and that her knowledge of the Scripture is close and practical. All will rejoice in the great things to which God has called her.

A TYPICAL LOGGING CAMP, NEAR ASHLAND, WIS.

From a Photograph secured by Miss Emma C. Nason.

a passage from the Gospels aloud for the benefit of the whole camp. Thus, when the evangelist pays a second visit he finds the ground prepared for him. Miss Nason has been much gratified, in more than one instance, by learning that some poor fellow who has been brought hurriedly to the hospital, wounded or dead from his dangerous occupation, has had in his pocket a treasured New Testament from his "Comfort Bag."

More evangelists have been sent out as funds were provided. It is notable as an evidence of what the constraining power of the love of Christ will do, that it has never been difficult to find men willing to undertake this arduous work. They are glad to go, with only the bare cost of food and clothing. They tramp through snows and blizzards, taking their chances of getting an occasional ride on some teamster's wagon, or some returning sleigh. They are not discouraged by any rebuff, nor scared at the threats of the reckless men who make money by providing the loggers with the means of gratifying their vicious appetites. These men know that the Evangelist is their most dangerous foe, for every from the field. During the past few months an additional cause of anxiety has weighed on his mind. His beloved daughter, Cora H. Nason, is one of the American Board's Missionaries in Armenia, and at Cesarea her life has been one of peril. She was an eye-witness of the recent dreadful massacre and has written home vivid descriptions of its horrors. Mr. Nason has been very anxious about her safety, but has committed her to the care of Him whom they both serve.

Miss Nason has recently added to her work at Sault Ste Marie, a refuge for fallen girls. This effort was forced upon her by the circumstances of the case. Many respectable girls were enticed to the neighborhood under the promise of employment, and on their arrival were horrified to find that they had been made victims of cruel deception. Some of these escaped from the dens to which they had been lured, and entreated Miss Nason to protect them and send them back to their homes. Others settled down in sheer despair of ever making their escape, and realizing that they were ruined, continued their life of sin. Miss Nason has taken care that they Crippled Molly.

HERE is a children's hospital uptown in New York, where in a long sunny room, there were rows of small white beds, on which patient children sit or lie, without a complaint, all day long.

Some of these little ones have been hurt by the violence of drunken parents, others have suffered from accidents, such as the children of the tenements are very liable to, falls, and burns, and bruises, which happen where the mother is too busy making the children's bread to look after them very carefully; still others have been born with a tendency to disease. Crippled Molly belonged to this last class. A painful trouble in the hip-joint developed when she was just eleven years old, and she was brought to the hospital, in the hope that good nursing, good medical care, food, air, and light, would build her up. Poor little Molly! When I saw her last, they were beginning to lose hope in her case, and thought they would have to send her to a Home for Incurables. Molly knew this and did not want to go. The hospital was the pleasantest home she had ever known. Kind ladies brought her pictures and books; she had a doll and she hadn't outgrown the love for it, which at her age, children sometimes do. The doll went to bed with her when she was obliged to lie still, for hours at a time, on an inclined plane, with a weight attached to her ankle; and it sat up with her when she had good days and could sit up in bed, and sew a little, or knit socks for babies, as she had learned to do.

Molly was a cripple, but Madeleine, the doll was as straight as an arrow, and as pretty as a princess, and she had never had an ache or a pain in her life.

Molly's favorite nurse was called Sister Theodora. And now I am coming to my story.

Away off in a land far over the sea, Sister Theodora had a friend, who like herself was a worker in a hospital. But the friend's lot was different from Sister Theodora's. Where her hospital was, there were wicked, cruel people called Turks, and other fiendish persons known as Kurds, and these had fallen with fire and sword on whole villages of hard-working peaceful men and women. They had burned up their homes, and stolen their possessions, and carried away their sheep and goats, and made slaves of their young girls.

Whenever Sister Theodora received a letter, and it was not very often, and the letter had to come a very roundabout way to get to her, but whenever she did receive a letter from her friend, she talked about it to the other nurses in the evening. Most of the little ones in the ward were asleep then, but crippled Molly slept badly, and she heard, and grew very much interested in the story of Armenia.

the story let me say which is the strangest and darkest and most disgraceful chapter in the history of the century.

Crippled Molly heard of the children brought in with gaping sword-wounds, and of the women who had been carried off and who had been sold into slavery, and of the terrible tragedy which kept happening. She turned it over in her mind, and when she said to herself, "Armenia! Armenia!" Armenia seemed in her eyes a woe-begotten land, a land of blood and tears, hills, and dragged over them till she fell down faint and nearly dead. And the child was not far wrong. As she lay back on her pillow, she forgot the ache in her poor hip in thinking how the children and their parents were suffering, were cold, and hungry, and homeless, away off in Armenia.

"This child is feverish," said Sister Theodora, waking up to a sense of Molly's excitement. "This will never do." She took the hot mite of a hand in her cool one, and looked into the burning blue eyes.

"What ails you, dear?" she said tenderly.

"I am almost dead," answered Molly, "thinking of poor Armenia. I want to do something for her. Here, Sister, is my silver quarter. Please send it to your friend."

Molly's silver quarter! It was as much to her as a ten dollar gold piece to a rich man's daughter; more in fact. A lady had given it to her one day, one of the visiting ladies, and Molly had kept it wrapped in white tissue paper under her pillow. She had never dreamed of spending it, but now wanted to give it away. It was a costly gift, and the Lord, who was pleased to accept the widow's two mites, was honored in the sacrifice. Sister Dorothea took it, for she could not deny Molly's wish, and the silver quarter went to help Armenia.

But a day came when the cripple was found too weak to go to the Home for Incurables. They had put it off from week to week, and now Sister Theodora and the doctors saw that she was going to a different and better home, and that very fast. There is a home, one sight of which, one touch of which, forever cures the sick, and there our little one was being carried fast.

She was looking out the window toward the sunset, Madeleine was in her arms, Madeleine with rosy cheeks and flaxen curls, and the taper fingers and blue eyes.

"Sister Theodora," the words came faintly, "when I am gone—to heaven—send Madeleine—to work—for Armenia." "I will," said the Sister, brushing away a tear. She knew that Molly felt as if the doll were almost alive; she did not know that to Molly, dying, had come a rare, womanly insight which made her aware of things a child could never have found out for herself.

But when the day came which ended Molly's life of pain and carried her, glad and strong and free, over the river, and to the home where the angels waited for her, the Home of the Cured, Sister Dorothea started Madeleine on her mission of love. She gathered a handful of bright little girls, and told them of Molly and her life and death; then she gave them the doll and said, "This is to be a missionary doll henceforth. You may manage her in any way you choose, but she is to be a dolly with something to do, and to earn, and to give away!"

The children liked the idea. They had a fair for Armenia, at one of their homes, and, dressed in the costume of an Armenian peasant, Madeleine held out her hand, a basket hanging from it, for contributions. They held a Junior Endeavor meeting, and Sister Dorothea came to it, and related Molly's request, and told how she had consecrated her all, and kept nothing back.

Some grown people thought it very queer and trifling to make this fuss about a doll, but the children all understood, and to-day through Madeleine, Crippled Molly still works for Armenia. And in heaven the Molly who is not crippled but has found her wings, sees, I believe, and is glad.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Bullet in His Bible.

Truly the Word of God is a shield and a buckler to those who trust in him. Mr. Charles Inglis, a clergyman, speaking at a recent meeting in London, related this remarkable incident: "Twenty years ago I was at a convention in the city of Dublin, and, after the meeting a gentleman put a Bible in my hand in which was a round hole in one of the covers. He said, 'I want you to look at it.' I took it up to look at it, and as I opened the Bible, I found leaf after leaf had this hole through it, and I said, 'What does it mean?'"

"He said, 'Five or six years ago, in a troubled part of the country where I was preaching, I had just finished a service in a farmhouse, and had got into my cart to ride home. Something said to me, 'Don't put your Bible into your coat pocket,' and I put it in my breast pocket. While riding I saw a flash, heard a report, and felt something had struck me. I said, 'Drive on quickly; I think I am shot, but I am not much hurt.'"

THE OIL PALM TREE AND ITS FRUIT

"The gentleman shortly afterwards found a hole in his overcoat, and he found the bullet embedded in that Bible, and it had stopped at the 17th of St. John, where it says, 'Father, keep them through thy own name.'"

"God unflinchingly watches over his children, and is never at a loss in devising means to effect their escape, even though they may have to pass through fire and water."

The Oil Palm-Tree.

Among the many trees that abound in tropical latitudes, there is probably none more highly valued than the oil palm, an example of which is shown in the illustration on this page. It grows in countless numbers in the interior of Africa and is a source of revenue to the natives. It bears on its branches a large conical fruit, from which is extracted a reddish oil which serves for many purposes. This oil is one of the chief articles of exportation in many parts of Africa. Our photograph, which shows a native woman carrying one of the fruit-cones of the palm-tree, was taken by Mr. Fritz Ramseyer, missionary of the Basle Mission, who had a wide experience as an explorer of the interior, entering from the West Coast.

THE LOCATION OF EDEN.

I HAVE read with much interest the account of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S representative to Armenia, Mr. Howard, as to the location of the Garden of Eden. I must, however, dissent from its location in Armenia. In all probability, in the early history of man Eden embraced the basins of both the Tigris and the Euphrates, but the description given in Genesis of the Garden would locate it near the head of the Persian Gulf. It was eastward in Eden. It seems to me the residence of Moses would have a good deal to do with determining its location. He lived about eighty years of his life first as a shepherd and then as a leader of the Hebrew people in the Sinaitic peninsula; and it was probably there that he wrote his books or caused them to be written. To him eastward would be the head of the Persian Gulf. It would be much more nearly northward than eastward if it were in Armenia. Then the landmarks of Paradise can be made out much more clearly than anywhere else. There was one main river passing through the Garden. We may imagine it spanned with natural bridges and its banks diversified with parks and luxuriant foliage and fruitage. From thence it was parted into four heads. The Tigris and Euphrates are easily recognizable but the Pison and Gihon are not so evident. In the early annals of the race, the Delta of the head of the Gulf may have been much longer than at the present time, and hence the two divisions of the river at the mouth would naturally be taken as two different rivers. Pison, the east one, would seem to compass the land of Havilah—a term that can be applied to any sandy land, such as portions of Persia, Beloochistan and India. Then, too, there was the bdellium and the onyx stone. Bdellium would be applicable to India, whether we consider a pearl or a resinous gum. Gihon is a term which means a bursting forth and is applicable to a spring, a fountain, or the mouth of a river. The branch to the west of the Delta was called Gihon and compassed the land of Ethiopia, a term for Africa. The use of the term Ethiopia stops the application of the Havilah. Genesis to Arabia and Sahara. Mr. Howard does not attempt to show how the terms Ethiopia and Havilah are applicable to the location of Paradise in Armenia. I do not think it can be successfully done. Its location near the junction of the Euphrates and Tigris is much more probable. To be sure, the Deluge and Father Time have obliterated much of its appropriateness. There is no way of adequately counting for the Deluge without supposing that there was a gradual settling of the continent, a tipping of it towards the south so that the fountains of the Great Deluge were broken up and the waters of the ocean came rushing in upon the land and the inland sea of Turkistan poured itself down upon the plains below. The gradual elevation of the land that succeeded caused the subsidence of the waters, but it probably never quite reached its former elevation, so that the delta above referred to was mostly submerged and the site of the Garden was covered with silt from the region above, and so the appropriateness of the place for Paradise is obscured. Such seems to be the conclusion to which we must come if we are desirous to maintain the story of Moses as a reliable historian and under the proper supervision of the Almighty.

THOS. E. SYMMES

Grandville, Mass.

The Gospel in Sumatra.

Great success is attending the work of the Rhenish Mission in Sumatra. At the beginning of last year there were 6000 candidates for baptism in the Battak tribe and of these 1000 were converts from Mohammedanism. In the southern part of the island the entire population have been followers of the false prophet, and six years ago no one thought it wise to tack the enemy in such a stronghold. At that time a missionary established himself among them, and recently reported baptisms, and 500 others as receiving instruction with a view to baptism. In the number are several chiefs. Evangelists are asked for on all sides, and even Mohammedan fanatics are turning to Christianity. Moslem priests, in despair of the cause, have actually left some of the villages. Java, out of a population of 2,000,000, has only 20,000 native Christians and thirty missionaries.

Aiding the Armenian Exiles.

Presbyterian Church at Urumia, Taiz, Salmas, Teheran, and Hamadan, and a considerable number of out-stations.
Each of these points converts have been gathered and a church organized. In Taiz, the ecclesiastical centre of the Armenians, the Mission is well equipped. There are two Mission Boarding Schools, one for girls, and the Memorial Training and Theological School for boys. Medical work among women is carried on effectively by L. Mary Bradford, who has an open door to the harems of all classes. Over 8,000 patients were treated last year.
The Armenian Protestant preacher in Tbriz is Mr. Nicoghos Guleserian. He is graduate of the Theological Seminary at Harpoot, and is a man of recognized ability, integrity and sterling character.
He has earned the respect of the community as an earnest Christian and a patriotic Armenian, loyal to Christ and his religion, fervent in prayer for its spiritual and worldly advancement. He has visited most of the Armenian communities of Northwestern Persia and has won friends for the Gospel. Mr. Guleserian and Mr. Vahan Imzarian (a graduate of Harpoot College and of Lane Theological Seminary, and now a teacher in the Memorial School), have just had terrible news from their homes in Turkey. The awful work of the unspeakable Turk never appeared so vivid as in a private letter concerning the massacre of the Guleserian family. The letter says:

"I am unable to describe the real facts concerning the district or our relatives, but I am constrained to write concerning our dear parents. In the last days of September, O. S., a dreadful attack was made by the Sultan upon Ichman, near Harpoot.
Among the slaughtered were your dear brother and other relatives, Uncle Bichos and his sons, Hannes and Stephen. (The latter has lived at Worcester, Mass.) After death their feet were bound in ropes and they were drawn off and thrown into the gardens. For some days they remained buried. Your brother Mugerutch and his son

Thomas were sought for, but have remained concealed. The rest of the family are left without bread, without clothing, without beds, and the new part of the house is burnt. This information I received from a secret letter of Baron M. and Cousin H.—(her father and brother are at New Britain), who fled here in the disguise of a Turkish woman.
H. adds a postscript saying: "I will only add that when the merciless Turks came and took away grandfather and smote brothers Stephen and Hohannes, our whole family in despair decided to go to the Euphrates to be drowned. We prayed over this until daylight, that the Lord might guide us. In the morning we saw it was not right to do so, so we remained alive." The letter continues: I said that some of our natives are concealed. Your mother is like a crazy person. She is scarcely able to move about, crying, bewailing, and begging her bread—aged 75. If your friends remain in their present condition, soon you will have no relatives left. Many of the pastors were killed. Among them, Revs., Sargis Nalghashian, Gazares Hosenian, Marderos Saraghian, and Mahab Hristian suffered martyrdom. But these affairs have also their profit. Now God is nearer to us. He has taken his loved ones.
I do not grieve for those who died in Christ, and to the last were sacrifices as martyrs. To the others may God be merciful. They need your encouragement."

Another letter of the same date speaks of similar occurrences at Shapik, the village where the home of Mrs. Guleserian is. Tens of thousands are homeless wanderers without bread, and will perish unless assistance reaches them.

A letter from the American Board representatives in Constantinople gives this further information regarding the relief work: "Missionaries at everyone of the stations where there has been massacre, and where there is now suffering, are doing much in the way of relief. Every dollar received has been already sent forward to the posts in the interior, and has begun its work of mercy there. The time and strength of the missionaries is occupied in this exhausting work. They are each feeding 2000, or 4000, or 1500 as the case may be." Another letter says: "The hours of the day are taken up with relief work, and they are worn out, body and mind. In Constantinople, the Bible House is given up almost entirely to this object.
There the missionaries have sent off nearly 200 large bales and boxes of clothing and material to various centres in the interior.

The relief work is growing upon their hands with astonishing rapidity and it has now reached a magnitude which is truly colossal. The American Board missionaries in Bitlis, Erzerum, Van, Mardin, Harpoot, Sivas, Casarea, Aintab, Marash and Hadjin are all devoting themselves to relief.
Letters which come directly and indirectly from the Armenians of the interior are profuse in their praises of the missionaries' work and in their expressions of gratitude to the donors in the United States. The missionaries are thronged with applications from remote people, who cannot be directly reached. The ladies of the station have organized the destitute women into working bands, buying cotton and wool and also clothing, and they are engaged in spinning, knitting and making garments for distribution. For this work they are paid eight cents a day, which furnishes relief for themselves and their families; at the same time they are kept busy, which is a great relief, and they produce garments that can be given to others. This method is repeated in various parts of the field."

In a letter from Van, just received (dated January 22d), Dr. Kimball writes:
"As soon as we had the assurance of the first $10,000 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we pushed forward the relief work with new vigor and more commens-urately to the present needs of the people.
This involved the need of larger quarters, and we found a very admirably adapted house of three stories with large halls that will hold several hundred people, and give convenient office rooms for the various departments—all for the magnificent sum of $6.60 a month rent. Applicants for help are required to bring a letter of recommendation from the district-men of the quarter in which they live, or from the village Refugee Committees. The demand for work does not abate, and we are adding daily to the thousand workers in the Industrial Bureau at the rate of from ten to twenty persons. Last week's pay roll shows 1,210 persons paid in total $445.

The cost of the raw material is slightly less than the wages so that with rent and other expenses we may put the cost of the Industrial Bureau at $900 a week. This work alone furnishes a living to considerably more than 5,000 people.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bakeries are forging along magnificently and are the great famine breaker to the entire community. There is no other source of supplies to the people as the contributions of the Armenians themselves were exhausted before the Armenian Christmas, and they turned all their beneficiaries over to us.
We are now distributing over 6,000 pounds of bread daily at the cost of $480 a week, and the demand is constantly increasing."

"Last Saturday was the Armenian Christmas, and on the day before, 9,000 persons were actually provided for through the different relief departments, and untold suffering relieved. We bless continually the generous people who made this work possible."

Rev. W. N. Chambers, Missionary at Erzerum, writes acknowledging receipt of $2,000 for relief work in that city, and in Erzinjan. "In Erzerum province over 200 towns and villages, comprising 11,000 houses, were plundered; 2,800 persons were killed and between 70,000 and 100,000 people left destitute. With THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other relief moneys, the missionaries are feeding 2,600 persons daily. The distress is indescribable."

Rev. J. L. Fowle, in charge of the work at Casarea writes (Jan. 29), acknowledging receipt of the contribution of $500 for relief at Gemarek where the destitution he says is "increasingly appalling." Wheat, flour and cotton will be purchased and the "self-help plan" will be adopted.

Speak Encouragement.

PUT on our table the cruet of sweet oil, as well as the cruet of vinegar and cayenne pepper. The vast multitudes have more burdens than they can carry. If you can unbuckle the strap one hole, so as to make it less tight, do so. "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." If a mechanic does for you a nice job of work, let him know that the banister is well turned, or the wall is well papered, or the carriage is well constructed. If the goods that come from your grocer are excellent, when you settle the bill let him know what thorough satisfaction he has given you. If, after long endurance from poor shoemaking, you get sandals that neither pinch nor chafe, let the man who sits wearily pulling the waxed thread through the leather know that he has saved you from pedal martyrdom. If a book that you read consoles or instructs or inspires you, inform both author and publisher of that cheering fact. If a musical instrument charms your household, so inform tuner and manufacturer. If a coat fits, thank the tailor. Be more economical of your censure and more prodigal of your encomiums.

Take warning from Thomas Carlyle, who passed the most of his married life, according to his own statement, in making his wife Jane miserable. For two weeks at Craigenputtock, fifteen miles from any settlement, not speaking a word to her, and at Cheyne Row, London, pitches an omelet out of the window because she had not cooked it to suit him. Inflicting upon her all the meannesses and outrages that a dyspeptic devil could suggest to him. And then, after her decease, spending twenty years in extolling her excellence and deploring his injustices. Appreciation while living! Be that our sentiment and habit, and while eminent men and women are ever and anon coming to occasions of public reprobation, let the same principle run all through everyday life. When the coffee is strong, and the bread is light, and the meat is masticable, and the dessert is delicately ingenious, let the husband praise the wife, and the wife praise the cook, and the cook praise the butcher and baker. When the child rapidly advances in schooling, pat him on the shoulder, and send an appreciative note with him to his overworked teacher. In that way we not only cheer others, but we help ourselves.

Send in a carriage, you want to make many miles in a short time. Suppose you begin by blowing up the driver, and then telling him what a lazy and ugly team he

OUR MAIL-BAG.

C. G., Cincinnati, O. Should not a wife who has property in her own name through inheritance, control it, to the extent of using some of the income in a way that she feels her conscience dictate?

In the State of Ohio, a wife's property, real and personal, and all income therefrom, remain under her sole control; but the husband must unite with her in all deeds and mortgages and sales of real estate. This applies to her property acquired either before or after marriage.

H. L. B., West Medford, Mass. Is it right or not for a person to let out his money for usury?

Assuredly not. See Prov. 28: 8; Jer. 15: 10; Isa. 24: 1, 2; Ezek. 18: 13.

W. M. H., Kennedy, Ala. To what seed did the Apostle refer in 1 John 3: 9?

There have been several explanations given of the passage, but the one generally accepted is that the Apostle means the seed of the Divine life which abides in the converted man and grows until it permeates the whole nature.

F. W. B., Bard, Iowa. Is the baptism of the Holy Ghost synonymous with conversion?

The phrase is generally used to indicate gift of power for service. Of course, the influence of the Holy Spirit is implied in conversion, but by the baptism, we usually understand such a quickening as took place at the descent of the Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost.

Mrs. C. A. S., Evans Mills, N. Y., writes thus, apropos of our popular premium, "The Pathway of Life."

Go speed on thy mission,
Thou beautiful treasure,
'Mid the storms and tempests so rife,
May each word contained,
Be given full measure,
While traveling the "Pathway of Life."

H. L., Donaldson, Minn. Give the most ancient date in Egyptian history?

The first of the dynasties, supposing the date to be successive, would be placed fully 50 years B. C., but many authorities hold certain dynasties to be contemporary and Manet speaks of contemporaneous kings. The monuments do not warrant so great an antiquity and lead to the conclusion that the beginning of the first dynasty was a little before 25 B. C.; some authorities making it 200 years later. Bunsen places the earliest point in Egyptian history at 3623 B. C.; Lepsius, 3890 B. C.; Brugsch, 4455, and Bockh, 5702, and Synecl states that the dynasties lasted 3555 years ending in 1680 B. C. Egyptologists, however, have discarded these latter calculations, as the monuments do not bear out the claim of great an antiquity.

John A. Robertson and seventeen others, Pembert N. J. 1. Do you think there is any harm in dancing? 2. Does the Bible forbid it? 3. Why does the Church raise the objection?

1. Dancing, originally used as an expression of devotional ecstasy (and still so employed in some parts of the non-Christian world), has in modern times come to be exclusively a social excitement. The harm especially to the young, consists in the promiscuous and frequently pernicious acquaintance it brings and the undue exhilaration and emotional disturbances it produces. 2. Inductive in the extreme, the modern dance is proved for countless thousands the first step to ruin. 3. There is no specific prohibition but one may be clearly inferred from I. C. 15: 33; II. Cor. 6: 17, 18; I. Pet. 4: 3; and similar passages. 3. Because it is an obstacle to individual spiritual progress and its influence detrimental to the morals of a community, would be impossible to indicate any instance where dancing has ever been productive of good results. For the sake of the harm it does to others, if not to ourselves, Christians should avoid it.

Susan D. Roberts, Canyon City, Tex. You say "fifty young ladies spent a month address this huge edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Please explain in THE MAIL-BAG what constitutes an edition, and was it the weekly issue and why it required that length of time to dress it?"

The edition of December 4th consisted 1,017,000 copies, for each of which a separate wrapper had to be addressed. The month of November, deducting four Sundays and four holidays, gave us twenty-four working days and it took about fifty girls twenty-four days to address these wrappers. A girl can average a thousand a day, but five per cent. should be allowed for loss of time through absence, disposition, etc. You will find, on calculation, the statement made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as to the number of young ladies required to address the special edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to have been founded absolutely in fact.

is driving, and at every jolt shouting, "Ouch! ouch!" as though you were being injured. The result of all will be slow progress and a grouchy driver and an unpleasant journey. But try the opposite. Say to the driver, if you can do so truthfully, "I suppose you have been a driver so long you are expert at the business. Those horses look as though they had a good deal of go in them. My! my! How fast we are going over the ground! I am sure we will be there sooner than I at the start expected." Why, such a spirit inspires the driver, greases the wagon-wheels, smooths the road, and limbers the spavined legs of the horses. Commendation instead of hypercriticism. Applause rather than disparagement! So civility rather than ostracism! Benison instead of anathema! Pæan instead of curse! Advocacy instead of reprehension! Compliment instead of carping! But many faithful people will not get the encouragement they deserve on earth. God give them patience to wait until Christ, in the presence of an assembled universe, shall hand them everlasting reward and pass them in to the pleasures that never die! For all the neglects, and injustices, and fatigues of God's children here, heaven will more than make amends.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietors, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it, and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

In Cape Coast Castle.

DISPATCHES from Cape Coast Castle, the capital of the British settlements on the Gold Coast, West Africa, announce a spectacle there that is not likely to be soon forgotten.

This was the arrival of the dreaded king of Ashanti, with ten of his relatives and officers. They came as prisoners of war, and were regarded with curiosity and wonder. King Prempeh had so long been the terror of the whole region, and the stories of the frightful massacres perpetrated by his order had been so appalling, that the spectacle of him and his chief advisers in the role of prisoners produced a sensation. The court-yard of the fortress, which is built on a rock, was crowded with men of all shades of color, prominent among them the chiefs of the tribes over whom Prempeh had tyrannized. These are to proceed to Kumassi to choose from among themselves, or from Prempeh's family, a king in his place, as all agree that it would be useless to rely on any promise he might make. The expedition occupied Kumassi without fighting. Messengers from the king had been to Cape Coast Castle, and had returned to him with information of the strength of the expedition. He had consequently determined to submit without a struggle. He was treated with respect, but was informed that he must go to Cape Coast Castle to await a decision as to his future. He showed an almost childish curiosity about his journey, as he had never been to the coast, though it is only about 150 miles from his capital. In Kumassi, the expedition found ghastly proofs of the truth of the horrible stories reported about the king's barbarities. The execution grove, which was promptly cut down, was covered with human skulls and bones, which showed that wholesale slaughter had been comparatively recent. In the chief square of Kumassi also, there were great heaps of skulls and bones. Though still a young man, Prempeh seems to have an awful record of savagery and to have been surrounded by men as barbarous as himself. There is general rejoicing among the peoples surrounding Ashanti over his fall, and at the prospect of a peaceable, orderly government under British supervision. The king is now learning by sad experience that cruelty and oppression bring their own retribution:

Who unto him that buildeth a town with blood, and establisheth a city by iniquity. (Hab. 2:12.)

A Church Moved.

Chicago journals describe the recent removal of a church in that city to a new site. They say that the proprietors of a large hotel on Michigan Avenue some time ago, made proposals to the officials of a church adjoining the hotel for a change of location. All the rooms on the side of the hotel overlooking the church were dark, and the hotel people believed that if the church were removed they could get an increased rental for the rooms. Finally they offered to purchase a new site, and pay the costs of removing the church to it. The offer was accepted. A piece of ground fifty feet distant was selected and preparations were made for moving the building.

It is a large edifice with a massive, square tower, and it was necessary to proceed cautiously. The building was jacked up from its foundations, and slowly and carefully removed to its new position, without accident or injury. The hotel proprietors will doubtless gain by the removal, but the situation is a somewhat novel one. As a rule, if a business becomes more profitable by the removal of a church, it is not because the church obstructs the light, but because it sheds more light on the business than is desired. With all its defects, the church fulfils the mission intrusted to her:

Ye are the light of the world. (Matt. 5:14.)

A Crisis in a Patient's Case.

A hospital surgeon tells a touching story of a patient's illness. A few days ago a woman was sent from Gouverneur Hospital, New York, to Bellevue. Shortly after her arrival her husband called and asked to be allowed to see her. While she was at Gouverneur his devotion had

The remedy was outside the province of the physicians, but it was effective. So the world often wonders at the transformation that comes in some lives when, after great distress, the heart is filled with joy by the recognition of Christ as the Saviour. There is no exaggeration in the promise:

The peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus. (Phil. 4:7.)

A Daring Rescue at Sea.

A press dispatch from Portland, Me., announces the arrival at that port of the steamer Blakemoor after a tempestuous voyage from England. The vessel bore marks of the severity of the storms she had passed through. Four days before reaching port, the crew had seen a vessel burning signals of distress. Though the sea was high and the weather intensely cold, five men volunteered to go to the rescue. The lifeboat was lowered, and after a desperate struggle reached the disabled vessel. She proved to be the schooner Clifford from New York, with a cargo of corn for Halifax. Her hold was full of water and she was listed so that her lee rail was awash. Her crew with great difficulty were transferred to the lifeboat. It took the brave men four hours to regain the Blakemoor, and the task of boarding her and hoisting the lifeboat was a trying one, as mountainous seas were breaking over the deck. The rescue was only just in time, for before the lifeboat reached the squandered. Yet his caprices could not over-step so enormous an income as he had. The tide turned when he became ambitious to increase his fortune. He plunged into grain speculation and planned for large prizes. He was unsuccessful, but he would not desist. In a short time he lost everything he had and was as poor as when he settled in Arizona. He went to Chicago to begin life over again, but could find no opportunity. A few months ago the man who had been so rich that he could pay a million dollars without inconveniencing himself, was glad to earn fourteen dollars a month by attending to the stoves in a hotel. Chagrin and self-reproach made him miserable, his health broke down and at last he was sent to the poor-house where he died a few days ago. He is not the first man who has been brought to want by the greed that is not satisfied with enormous wealth. Long ago the wise king uttered a warning to all such:

He that hasteth to be rich . . . considereth not that want shall come upon him. (Prov. 28:23.)

BRIEF NOTES.

This Issue has no Colored Frontispiece. Do you miss it? Do you think it makes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD more attractive or would you prefer to have it omitted? We avail ourselves of the omission to make the above inquiries. We always warmly welcome and heartily appreciate a candid expression of opinion on the part of our readers. A postal card will do. The colored pictures will be resumed next week.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no traveling agents. We are informed that persons are traveling around the country offering special inducements to people to subscribe. It should be clearly understood that they are unauthorized, and anyone subscribing through them does so at his own risk. It is always best when the local agent is not personally known, to send subscriptions direct to this office. We have lately received several complaints, from various quarters, of people being imposed upon by persons wrongfully claiming to be authorized agents of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey and Mr. and Mrs. Stelbins held meetings on Feb. 6th in the Methodist Tabernacle at Pasadena, Cal. They expected to be at Los Angeles at the close of February and have promised to hold meetings there. A very large congregation listened attentively to the singing and to Mr. Sankey's description of the circumstances that suggested several famous hymns.

An image of the Virgin Mary in a church at Palermo, Italy, has been stripped of its jewels by thieves who entered the church. The statue wore twenty pairs of diamond earrings and dozens of valuable bracelets, its robe being ablaze with precious stones. The image was reputed to work miracles but the thieves stripped it with impunity.

Dr. L. W. Munhall closed his Meetings at Dubuque, Ia., on February 18. There was a great farewell meeting on that evening when over five hundred persons who have made profession of faith during the services came to listen to the Evangelist's final words of advice. All the Christian churches in the city are receiving additions from the converts of the meetings.

Mr. Holman Hunt, the famous Artist, has Published a letter pointing out a way for the restoration of Palestine to the Jews. From personal knowledge and from conversation with influential statesmen in Turkey Mr. Hunt has become convinced that the Sultan would be willing to sell Palestine to the Jews on the basis of a capitalization of the revenues he receives from the country.

Rev. Thomas Harrison is in the Midst of a great Revival at Camden, N. J. The Tabernacle M. E. Church is crowded every night. The audiences number fully twelve hundred persons. A few evenings ago the rare spectacle was witnessed of three hundred persons at the altar at one time anxiously seeking salvation. A local journal says that there has been no such religious awakening in the city for a quarter of a century.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman held Revival Services last week in several churches in the Twenty-fifth Ward of Brooklyn. On February 23, Dr. Chapman preached in the James Methodist Church in the morning; in the Embury Methodist Church in the afternoon and in the Lewis Avenue Congregational Church in the evening. Simultaneous services were held each afternoon and evening in those churches and in Calvary Baptist, and Greene Ave. Presbyterian churches.

Gen. Booth the Chief of the Salvation Army has appointed his daughter Emma and her husband Commissioner Booth-Tucker. Commanders of the Salvation Army in the United States in place of Mr. and Mrs. Ballington Booth. Commissioner Booth-Tucker is said to be a brother of the late Miss Tucker the famous novelist who wrote under the title of A. L. O. E. He is at present at the head of the Salvation Army in India. Great dissatisfaction prevails in the Army here at the summary manner in which Mr. and Mrs. Ballington Booth have been removed from their offices.

COURT-YARD OF THE FORTRESS OF CAPE COAST CASTLE, WEST AFRICA.

won the hearts of doctors and nurses. He was permitted access to her and would stay around in the yard between his visits, that he might question any doctor who came out of the ward as to her condition. They would answer him kindly and give him all the encouragement they dared. But toward the last they could not give much, and when it was decided to move her to Bellevue, the danger could not be disguised. He expected that he would be able to see her there, but no one knew him and he was told that it was against the rules. "It's nearly ten o'clock," said the surgeon, "you cannot go up. Besides, it is a bad case. I heard them talking about it." The man flung himself on his knees. "I never knelt to mortal man before," he cried; "for mercy's sake take me to my wife that I may see her before she dies." The surgeon's heart melted. He went up to the ward, found the woman tossing in fever and asking for her husband. He came back and beckoned the man to follow him, warning him to be quiet and not stay long. There was a little weak cry of joy from the cot, as he bent over it, and a poor wasted arm was thrown around his neck. In a minute or two he stole noiselessly away. His wife had quieted down and was asleep. The next morning the physician in charge of the case said: "Queer thing, that Gouverneur case. It looked pretty bad last night, but she went to sleep like a lamb all of a sudden and slept all night, and now, I guess, she'll pull through." Her husband's visit had produced the rest and peace that no medicines could have given and probably saved the woman's life.

Blakemoor, the disabled Clifford turned over and sank. It was well for the sailors that when the lifeboat came alongside, they did not lose any time hesitating about leaving the sinking ship. They would have been lost if it had been necessary to plead with them and persuade them, as it is with some who are in danger of perishing eternally:

Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee. (Acts 24:25.)

Millionaire Dies a Pauper.

Chicago journals report the death in that city of a man whose wealth a short time ago was counted by millions. He was the owner of the famous mine at Tombstone, Arizona, that was known as "The Gilded Age." He owned also the land above the mine which comprised a large portion of the business section of Tombstone. Yet the man died a pauper's death in the poor-house, and as he left no money to bury him, his body was given to the School of Anatomy for dissection. His career had been remarkable. He was a poor man when he went with the first settlers to Arizona. He squatted on a strip of apparently worthless land, but when the boom came, his land was found to be the richest in the section. He had to fight in the courts for his claim, but he succeeded in establishing his title. The money he obtained from the mine and from the rentals of his property on the surface, made him rich beyond the dreams or avarice. He revelled in his good fortune, scattered money right and left, and astonished even a community accustomed to reckless extravagance by the sums he

A Georgia Cabin Home.

IT will be many years before the old-style cabin homes of our mountainous districts wholly disappear. They are found in many States, from New York to the Rockies and from the Lakes to the Gulf, and they form a picturesque element of the landscape that would be greatly missed.

In Georgia, the log cabin is still a familiar sight; vine-wreathed and old, with clap-board sides and shingle roof, it bravely withstands the storms of the passing years. Beneath its homely roof many of the foremost men of our nation have spent their boyhood, and there are many thousands to whom a sight of the old cabin-home recalls the pleasantest memories of their lives.

Our illustration presents a typical negro cabin home in the South—such a home as must be familiar to all who are acquainted with Southern life and character. There are the well-known stone chimney and clap-board, and the porchless front. Although it consists of only a single room, the cabin looks cosy enough, and it is certainly not lacking in picturesqueness. There are evidences, too, of hasty construction, both in the manner in which the logs are laid and in the fact that holes are substituted for windows, which seem to have been considered too great a luxury to be indulged. From the general appearance of the cabin, and the fact that there are enough holes and crannies to assure an exit for the smoke and an entrance for the fresh air, it must strike the observer as a more desirable place for summer than for winter occupancy; but the hardy dwellers on the mountain-sides, reckon nothing of weather that would appal those who live in the well-built houses of towns and cities. With a potato and melon patch in summer time, and a good pile of firewood for the cold season, they are content to endure without flinching the spring gales and freshets, the summer tempests, and the fierce winter storms.

Luther's Little Daughter.

Those who have lost a child—perhaps an only one—cannot but derive some comfort from the words which Luther spoke just after his daughter, Madeleine's death. When she was placed in the coffin he gazed long at her and said, "Dear little Madeleine, all is well with thee now." And to his wife, "Think where she is gone. She has certainly made a happy journey. With children everything is simple. They die without anguish, without disputes, without bodily grief, without the temptations of death, as if they were falling asleep."

Children and the Bible.

A beautiful story is related of an incident which occurred during the late Civil War. One evening a number of horsemen rode by a lonely house and found it to be a negro cabin. One of the men was away with one of the armies. "Come out at once; not a moment to lose! The enemy are on us! They will blow up the magazine and the house along with it!" The mother gathered her children, and with the help of the servants dressed them in their warmest clothes. "We must run to the forest and perhaps stay there all night." "Oh, mother," they cried, "the wild beasts will eat us!" "We must trust in God," she replied, "and leave this house in five minutes; so run and collect everything you can of value." When they assembled in the hall before starting one boy and girl carried between them on a stick a basket filled with the Bibles of the family. "Mother," they both cried out together, "we have saved the most valuable thing, for you have always told us that the Bible was the most precious thing in the world." Shortly afterward, the entire family reached a place of safety.

Jaded Wives.

To neglect one's life partner, to whom our best love and purest sympathy should go out spontaneously, is one of the greatest of crimes, in a social and affectional vent of new persons about our hearth, unless it be the progress of the character which draws them. Lander in his definition of the great man says: "It is he who can call together the most select company when it pleases him." It is the happiness which, where it is truly known, postpones all other satisfactions, and makes politics and commerce and churches cheap. For we figure it to ourselves—do we not?—that when men shall meet as they should as states meet—each a benefactor, a shower of falling stars, so rich with deeds, with thoughts, with so much accomplishment it shall be the festival of nature, which all things symbolize; and perhaps love is only the highest symbol of friendship, as all other things seem symbols of love. In the progress of each man's character, his relations to the best men, which at first seem only the romances of youth, acquire a graver importance, and he will have learned the lessons of life who is skilful in the ethics of friendship.

Don't Worry the Children.

Parents need to be reminded occasionally of the fact that their children should not be fretted or worried needlessly, as is too often the habit of some fathers and mothers. The Bible has the warning: "And ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath," a clause which Archdeacon Farrar sense. Because a wife loses her first bloom, because her husband outgrows her intellectually, because another has come to seem lovelier in his eyes, a husband is afforded thereby no excuse whatever for neglect. Because a husband is selfish, because he is parsimonious or mean, because he is tyrannical, because he objects to her friends, a wife has no more excuse. Life may become all but unbearable with him or with her; but if there are children with a future to be considered, it is to be borne, and duty and decency must enforce a behavior before the children that shall hinder their injury from wrong influences so far as possible. The utmost frivolity, the utmost indifference to his wishes, does not justify a husband in pulling the cloth from the table and all the china with it; his pulling the cloth off does not justify her in putting herself under the illegal protection of another. A little concession on either side, a little touch of the old-time affection, will sometimes release the strain of months or years, and make the two estranged hearts as considerate of each other's happiness as before. But it remains true, that no more cruel blow can be given by a husband to a wife than to remind her, by word or act, that she has ceased to be attractive in his eyes.

The Choice of Friends.

The ornaments of a house, says Emerson, are the friends who frequent it. There is no greater event in life than the ad-says, in the original means exactly: "Do not irritate your children." "Do not rub them the wrong way." The modern father or mother, anxious to bring up their child in accordance with all the latest methods, is in danger of overdoing the training of the little one. A father, who had learned by experience the wisdom of letting his children alone to a certain extent, declares that he harmed his first child for life by his exacting requirements. She was checked unduly and shut up within herself until she grew up in a rigid and unnatural constraint. The same warning might be applied to children of an older growth, who are not permitted to develop their own individualities. Dr. Farrar sums the whole matter up in one sentence: "Parents must respect their children as well as children their parents."

Early Lessons in Giving.

It is wrong to give a boy money without teaching him that a proportion of it belongs to God, writes Headmaster Lyttelton, of Halesbury College, England. While he is very young it is easy to train him to put by something for the poor box out of every shilling he receives; as a matter of course. Why in the world should this be deferred? and till what time? The early possession of money is ingraining one of two ideas deep into his mind, either that he is a steward or that he is the owner of the cash.

Only One Hour.

ONLY one hour! the hour at Sabbath School, The children's happy hour, Where love is King and none but he Need ever hope to rule.

Only one hour! Fast flies the time When there's so much to do; The lesson seems but scarce begun When clear the church-bells chime.

Only one hour! No time to spare If we but do our part, Earnestly and cheerfully Asking God's blessing there.

HARRY GREY.

A Woodland Home Concert.

ONE of our lady readers, Mrs. N. B. Palmer, of Napoleon, O., sends us this charming episode of woodland life, apropos of the recent paragraph in this department on the birds' hymn of praise: "Many years ago we left our pleasant surroundings to take up a new home in the 'woods.' A very little clearing had been done, and the spring was tardy in coming. It rained and rained almost day and night for nearly a week, until the low ground was saturated with water. The Sabbath following was ushered in most gloriously. The sun shone brighter than ever before, seemingly; not even a cloud flitted over the sky. I was attracted by bird music in the tall trees a few rods from our cabin: as I listened it seemed almost to come from Paradise. As the leaves had not yet opened on the trees, I could see plainly that one tall one was literally covered with blackbirds, and such music as they made abides with me yet, and the scene plainly visible to my view as if it were only a year instead of thirty-eight years. There would be a lull now and then, and next a voice or two as if giving out a hymn or in prayer, when the whole flock would join in the grand chorus. This was kept up a long time, only pausing at intervals. Soon as their meeting had closed they flew away as if conscious they had dispelled the blues of their human listener! Then the frogs began tuning their harps, and at evening broke forth as if they too were doing their best to dispel our doubts as to the lateness of spring! It was all so enchanting to me I sat down and wrote the following lines as a tribute to the grandest bird anthem I ever heard:

Spring is here. Do you not see it Laughing, tossing in the breeze?
Don't you hear its gentle wooing
In the tall and stately trees?

Don't you hear the warbling songsters?
They're a meeting in the woods,
They are singing, praying, preaching,
What care they for wind or floods?

They are happy, joyful, thankful,
For the long-washed days of spring,
And they're sending notes of gladness
To their Maker, who is King.

And the peepers, don't you hear them
Almost split their little throats?
There are frogs by tens and hundreds,
Tuning up their noisy notes!

Now Spring is here, tho' tardy yet—
Her green is slow in coming.
But birds and frogs in praise have met
With voices softly humming.

Curbing Childish Impulse.

Too many parents seem to take it for granted that, because their children are by nature very timid and retiring, or very bold and forward; very extravagant in speech and manner; or quite disinclined to express even a dutiful sense of gratitude and trust; reckless in their generosity, or pitifully selfish; one-sided in this, or in that, or in the other, trait or quality characteristic—therefore those children must remain so; unless, indeed, they grow their faults, or are induced by wise counsel and loving courtesy to overcome them. "My boy is irrepressible," says father. "He is full of dash and spirits. He makes havoc in the house while at home and when he goes out to a neighbor's he either has things his own way, or he doesn't want to go again. I really wish he had a quieter nature; but, of course, I can change him." But children can be trained in almost any direction. Their natural tendencies may be so curbed and guided as no longer to show themselves in disagreeable prominence. It is a parent's privilege, and duty, to influence his children to a right behavior.

Keeping the Pledge.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning March 15.
Matthew 26 : 31-41.

DATHETIC with tender affection were the words our Lord used in his reproach of the three disciples who slept while he suffered in the garden. Face to face with the culminating horror of his life knowing that in a few hours he would be brutally beaten and nailed to the cross, shivering as the shadow of his approaching death fell upon him, there was his heart a human longing for sympathetic companionship. Near him were the three men who had just pledged their devotion to him. They would leave their desert him, they said, though they might be called upon to die with him. As he goes out to them, craving their sympathy, he finds them asleep. They could not watch with him one hour. So they were moved by his distress, that they could sleep. But even then, his tenderness finds excuse for them. It is their flesh that is weak; but their spirit was willing. How often since then has he made the same excuse for his followers! The pledges made to him have often been unfulfilled when the time of stress came. Promises have been made to confess him before men, yet when the flippant joke or the contemptuous sneer at religion, the biting sarcasm at sacred things have been uttered the follower of Christ has shrunk from avowing himself. Every possession is consecrated to him, yet an article of dress, or some jewelry, or some pleasure, or luxury will draw the money from the pocket which should have been reserved for works of charity. Communion with him should be the highest pleasure for the one who call themselves by his name, yet the prayer-meeting neglected for some scene of worldly pleasure. Neighborly business acquaintances and personal friends do not know how good he is nor what joy he gives to those who give themselves to him, yet the follower has not told them, nor exerted himself to win them to Christ. When the enemy is busy, when the traitor is plotting the way of attack, the friends whom he has exhorted to watch should not be off their guard or asleep.

Christ's excuse for his three disciples shows the constant source of danger. It is flesh that is weak in his service. It is long in its power of thwarting the spirit, and in bringing it into subjection. The fact of the two natures must be recognized by every one who resolves to lead a Christian life. Many a time is the Christian Endeavor pledge taken in all sincerity and with the full intention of fulfilling it, when there is a failure ahead. It could not surprise any one to find that constant and persistent effort is required. The Christian life is a struggle and it is so represented in the New Testament. The flesh needs to be overcome. It is perpetual demanding indulgence, and when the spirit aspires to active service, the flesh introduces an inertia that is not easily moved. The fact discourages many young believers. They think that this sluggishness in the Lord's service is a sign that they are not converted. It will encourage them to know that all feel it in a greater or less degree. The triumph consists in conquering opposition, in becoming master of the kingdom of self. And this triumph is won. The power that Christ gives makes victory certain for all who will use it. The new life which he imparts will grow until it controls the whole being. This is the way to conquest and to the reward. He who would keep his pledge must distrust his own nature and must look to Christ for strength.

The Backslider.

RETURN, O wanderer, return,
And seek an injured Father's face;
Those warm desires that in thee burn
Were kindled by reclaiming grace.

Return, O wanderer, return,
And seek a Father's melting heart,
Whose pitying eyes thy grief discern,
Whose hand can heal thy inward smart.

Return, O wanderer, return;
He hears thy deep repentant sigh;
He saw thy softened spirit mourn,
When no intruding ear was nigh.

Return, O wanderer, return;
Thy Saviour bids thy spirit live;
Go to his bleeding feet, and learn How freely Jesus can forgive.

Christian Love.

THIS did not once so trouble me,
That better I could not love Thee;
But now I feel and know
That only when we love, we find
How far our hearts remain behind
The love they should bestow.

While we had little care to call
On Thee, and scarcely prayed at all,
We seemed enough to pray;
But now we only think with shame
How seldom to Thy glorious name
Our lips their offerings pay.

And when we gave yet slighter heed
Unto our brother's suffering need,
Our hearts reproached us then Not half so much as now, that we
With such a careless eye can see
The woes and wants of men.

In doing is this knowledge won,
To see what yet remains undone;
With this our pride repress,
And give us grace, a growing store,
That day by day we may do more,
And may esteem it less.

Apples of Sodom.

AS are those apples, pleasant to the eye,
But full of smoke within, which used to grow
Near that strange lake where God poured from the sky
Huge showers of flame, worse flame to overthrow;
Such are thy works, that with a glaring show
Of humble holiness, in virtue's dye
Would color mischief, while within they glow
With coils of sin, though none the smoke decry.

Bad is that angel that erst fell from heaven,
But not so bad as he, nor in worse case,
Who hides a traitorous mind with smiling face,
And with a dove's white feathers clothes a raven;
Each sin some color has it to adorn:
Hypocrisy almighty God doth scorn.

The Midnight Cry.

The Clues Prophecy Gives us as to the Nature and Characteristics of the Warning.

BY REV. E. J. HYTCHE.

IN considering the midnight cry we shall have left out an important factor in the solution of this mystery if we forget that the foolish virgins "went forth to meet the Bridegroom," as much as did the wise. Nor are they represented as going forth in mere human strength; for they had oil, the type of the graces of the Holy Spirit, with their flambeaux, or they could not have been kindled, nor could they be going out when the midnight cry was heard. This fact at once implies that they were not mere formalists, however drowsy and meagre their supply of oil. But their fate was so different when the Bridegroom came—the one class included, and the other shut out from the marriage supper—that it is shown that there was some radical distinction in their character, though both alike slept. What then it may be asked will be the distinction between the wise and the foolish virgins when the Master calls? Simply this—that, whilst the wise virgins will be that remnant who will protest against the evils of Christendom, the foolish will be that class who vainly attempt to serve God and Mammon, or who are so engrossed by the acquisition of wealth or of social distinction that their piety is at zero, and if not quite extinct, shows every sign of "going out." Hence trying the fatal experiment to "make the best of both worlds," they will be left behind in the world when the rapture of the Church occurs, and so will suffer all the horrors which will mark the time of Antichrist.

Nor can the midnight cry be the rapture of that favored remnant, who are typified by the Church of Philadelphia, and to whom the Holy Spirit promised this special reward (Rev. 3: 10), because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I will also keep thee from the hour of trial which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth." For, though in the main faithful, yet the wise virgins, equally with the foolish ones, will either be dozing or fast locked in sleep when the cry is heard, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." They, in fact will not be aroused from their slumbers until this startling proclamation is made by those heralds God will specially appoint for that purpose. As notwithstanding their drowsiness their flambeaux will not only be alight, but with sufficient oil in reserve, they will, escape those vial-plagues, and not hear those awful woe-trumpets with which the earth—especially the realms of Antichrist—will be visited, and which will appal an apostate world. For as in the case of Abraham's nephew (Gen. 20: 22), the avenging angels "cannot do anything" before the church is rescued. This painful prediction of the exclusion of the foolish virgins from the company of the translated Church, ought to serve as a note of warning to believers. If Holy Writ reveals anything of God's doings with mankind it is this, that he has never punished any nation—whether Jewish or Gentile—without giving a solemn warning of the impending judgment. So it is with the Church of these last days: For the epistles to the seven Asiatic churches—prophetical epitomes as they are of Church history—tell us in language never more needed than now, that (1. Pet. 4: 17), "Judgment must first begin at the house of God," or the visible Church. If so, "Let him that hath an ear, hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches."

THE CHARITY THAT COVERETH.

Sermon by Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, D. D., First Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga. Text: "For charity covereth the multitude of sins." 1. Peter 4: 8.

FEW things are more prolific of evil than a misconception and perversion of the Word of God. Some of the most direful corruptions in religion, literature, commerce, and politics are traceable to it. No passage in the sacred Scriptures has been more frequently misinterpreted and misused than the one which we are about to consider.

The Revised Version reads: "Love covereth the multitude of sins." Every person who is acquainted with the Greek language knows that this is a better translation. The word which in the old version is rendered "charity," means love—love in its most comprehensive sense. Charity is only one expression of love. The love of which we are about to speak belts the globe. While it regards especially "the household of faith," it is concerned for the welfare of all men in all things.

Of all the spiritual treasures love is the greatest. Without it, knowledge, prophecy, faith, and hope are worthless. It is the mother of all the virtues. The man who is dominated by it will have all the graces that distinguish and adorn true Christian character. He is a partaker of the Divine Nature for God is love. Love is not only pre-eminent in power and beauty, but also in duration. It is eternal. It is like the brazen cross on some cathedral tower, which shines like a star of evening when all beneath is obscured by the gathering gloom of night. Of all the elements of Christian character and life, it is the most practical. It is always manifesting itself in undertakings for the betterment of the world's condition.

The Counterfeits.

It has its counterfeits. There is a sentimentalism which expends itself in rhapsody, and sometimes in tears. In that there is not even the shadowy ghost of love. The men and women who keep their emotions stirred by reading fictitious stories of human poverty and suffering, but who never darken the door of a pauper's hut, or connect themselves with any organized effort to relieve the needy and wretched, are only sentimental dreamers. Among the world's helpers they count for nothing. Love is ever pouring itself out on some altar of sacrifice. It is ever lifting some burden from human shoulders. It is ever shining upon somebody's darkness, or healing somebody's wounds, or fighting somebody's battles. It is ever going about doing good, wondering at every step at the blindness and folly of those who look for happiness in a life of self-seeking.

It will be interesting and profitable for us to consider how love acts in covering a multitude of sins. Let it be understood that the sins of which the apostle here speaks are not the sins of the man who loves, but of those upon whom he bestows his love. The old Papal heresy, that a man may offset his bad deeds by a few good deeds, is founded upon a false conception of this passage. Men have been taught to believe that they can cover their own sins by good deeds. When Protestants subscribe to creeds in which this doctrine is rejected and denounced, thousands of them practically endorse it. A man who has been a drunkard and a gambler, and whom God will hold responsible for a large share of the poverty, wretchedness, and crime of our country, gives fifty thousand dollars to the endowment fund of an Orphans' Society. In making that gift he believes that it will be accepted by a righteous God as an offset for the guilt he has incurred in debauching and destroying human lives, and in promoting every species of lawlessness and crime. In this satanic delusion he is confirmed by the manner in which the newspapers applaud and magnify him, and by the complimentary terms in which the Christian men and women, entrusted with the care of the institution, accept his charity.

I covet the opportunity of representing a benevolent institution in receiving such a gift from such a man. In accepting it, I would try to illustrate that love which is ever ready to help a condemned sinner to see himself as God sees him. I would tell him that if his gift was a thousand fold larger it would not relieve him of his awful responsibility and guilt, and that the only possible escape for him from punishment is in a prompt renunciation of his diabolical vocation, and open penitential confession of his guilt, and a sincere acceptance of Jesus Christ as his Redeemer and Master. In doing this I would expose to thousands of deluded men and emphasize to the joy of all saints, and to the glory of God, an essential truth of our blessed Christianity.

I am president of a Board of Missions, and if such a man would choose me as his medium for conveying such a gift to our needy treasury, the terms in which I would accept the contribution might horrify the political newspapers, but they would gladden the heart of all lovers of purity and rectitude.

Still more serious are the fruits of this delusion in the very bosom of the church. As a rule the paying members of a church are the praying members. The man who is sincerely pious—spiritually minded and circumspect in his deportment before the world—bears cheerfully his just proportion of the expenses of his church. Any man who claims to be pious and refuses to do this is a canting hypocrite.

But all the paying members are not praying members. The weakness and inefficiency of many churches is explained by the fact, that scores of their paying members do not pray. They are not pious; they are not spiritual; they are not circumspect before men. They are unspiritual, worldly and wicked. They are seduced by the devil into believing that God will accept paying as a substitute for praying. They are anything but pious. They prefer the play-house to the prayer-meeting; they abandon themselves to a life of self-gratification, and when their consciences begin to act, the devil comes to their relief by whispering to their credulous souls, "Be not troubled about your sins, for the treasurer's books will show that you pay well for the support of the church." Oh, for the righteous intrepidity and godly impetuosity of a John Knox, or a John the Baptist, that I might sweep from your minds these and implant in your souls a sense of the awfulness of that wrath which awaits creature who dares to make light of his obligations to God, and trifles with such tremendous realities as guilt, judgment and eternity. Oh, that I could confront you to-day with something like the holy frenzy of Chrysostom, when seemingly with the collected audacity and might of all the heroes and martyrs that had preceded him, he rebuked the sins of the Church, struck terror to the hearts of those who were asleep in Zion, and constrained even the liveried officials of the sanctuary to confess their guilt, and cry aloud to God for mercy. "Covereth a multitude of sins!" Verily they are a multitude—a vast innumerable multitude. I sometimes try to calculate the sins that have been committed against all human beings, living and dead that their charity is required to cover, but my head grows dizzy with the problem.

In what way may our love cover sins against ourselves and sins against society? By white-washing them? By looking upon them as mere foibles? By regarding them with that loose spirit which is careless of the distinctions that God makes between right and wrong? There is a constant temptation to do this. A false judgment of the sins of others makes it easier for us to excuse our own iniquities. There are men in this community who always are ready to apologize for the liquor-drinking, drunkenness, gambling, ludeness and dishonesty in other people, because they could not condemn these things without condemning themselves. There is no love in thinking lightly of any act which violates moral law and disturbs the order of God's moral universe. It is not love but cowardice that inspires a man to excuse vice. God has pronounced a curse upon him who saith to the wicked, "Thou art righteous."

Sins it Cannot Cover.

There are foul cess-pools in the cities of this land which some men are ever attempting to make sweet by sprinkling rose-water upon them. They have tried to invest the lowest class of variety-theatres with a halo of moral beauty and loveliness. How exalted must be the moral standard, and how purifying and uplifting must be the moral influence of an institution, where the toughs and rowdies of a community gather to glorify ruffians whose vocation has been outlawed by the government of every civilized country on the globe.

Who is the charitable man? The apologist for such an institution, or the man who, seeing its debauching influence on society, portrays its real character, and gives warning to the public of the perils that lurk within its portals?

The Psalmist says, "Blessed is the man who walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners." What is the character of the men and women who appear upon the stage of a variety-theatre? Are they godly or ungodly? Righteous or wicked? Are the influences surrounding such a place promotive of moral beauty and Christian integrity? No honest man will say that they are wholesome. Tell me not that I am narrow, illiberal, and uncharitable, when I speak the truth concerning such an institution, and invoke upon it the reprobation of all virtue-loving people.

Notwithstanding love's uncompromising hostility to all manner of wrong-doing, it does cover a multitude of sins. Charity covers a man's sins against me when I forgive him as freely and fully as God forgives me. To forgive one who has wronged you, is to cease to feel unkindly toward him, to expel from your breast any purpose or desire to punish him for the injury he has done you, and to covet earnestly opportunities to bestow favors upon him. There is a sort of that has a thousand needles on it, and in which there is more vindictiveness than love. You take a man who has offended you and set him down before the blow pipe of your indignation, and scorch him from head to foot, and then you forgive him, with the solemn admonition, that if he should ever repeat the offense, you will incinerate him. Sin is not covered by such charity. How unlike this was the forgiveness of the father in the parable, who saw the prodigal afar off, ran and fell on his neck, kissed him, and wept for joy.

The noblest and the most Godlike response to an enemy is, "I forgive you." Polyargus heard himself abused in a theatre. Unable to bear the indignity he went out and hanged himself. When the Greek comedians tried to offend Socrates by making him appear ridiculous, he laughed at them. When the Pasquins pronounced their bitter invectives against Augustus, he would not notice them. But when Jesus was robed in mock royalty, spit upon, buffeted, and nailed to a cross, he said, "Father, forgive them."

In the love which forgives there is a subduing and transforming power. A very aged negro woman stood at a street corner trying to make a support for herself by selling a few apples. A wicked Irish sailor passing by, knocked her basket from her hand, and scattered her fruit over the pavement. He then stood a little distance from her expecting to see her fret and hear her swear. But looking up at him with pity she said, "Young man, forgive you, and may my Heavenly Father forgive you, too." The gentleness and magnanimity of the old negro touched the heart of the rude sailor. He was ashamed, self-condemned, and penitent. After compensating her for the injury to her fruit he grasped her hand and said, "God bless you, kind mother, I will never do it again." In the English army there was a soldier who had been punished a hundred times for disorderly conduct. Every sentence pronounced against him, and every punishment that he received, seemed only to strengthen his spirit of insubordination. One morning he was brought before the Colonel charged with a number of serious offenses, and expecting to be punished with exceptional severity. The Colonel looked at him with a tender expression and said, "Jack, my heart is moved with pity for your incorrigible depravity, and therefore grant you a free and full pardon for your latest misconduct." Jack was instantly subdued. The mercy of the Colonel made him another man. From that hour he was a model soldier. The timely and wisely bestowed charity covered a multitude of sins.

How many momentous considerations there are to incite us to the practice of virtue. We are the only creatures of whom upon whom the prerogative of forgiving sins has been conferred. It does not belong to the infernal spirits, nor to the angels in heaven. It is only in this world that we shall have opportunity to forgive. In that better land, on which falls no shadow, rests no stain, there is no sin to be forgiven. But the most inspiring thought is that of all our prerogatives of all the virtues which are possible to human beings, it is the most Godlike Must Not Tempt Others.

Your charity may cover a multitude of sins by refraining from tempting others either by word or act, to do wrong. Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath. How many fathers and mothers provoke their children to sin by an unwise and vexatious discipline. How many lead their children into a career of sin by living before them a sinful life. What better can a life of dissipation and shame can be expected of the boy who has seen his father enter a bar-room? What better than a life of frivolity and ungodliness can be expected of a girl who knows that her mother thinks more of the theatre than of the house of God? If you have not Christian charity for those who are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, what can we hope for yourself in the Judgment to be Great Day? Oh, how much of sin in human hearts could be kept back, subdued, and finally eradicated, by a consistent walk and godly conversation on the part of those who, by holding membership in the Church of Christ, profess to be the salt of the earth and the light of the world. When a church-member, and especially a member holding an official position in the church, is found in some place of amusement where the ethics of his religion are laughed at, and the moral atmosphere is laden with the vilest impurities, his presence there serves to confirm the scepticism in their scepticism, and the wickedness in their wickedness.

Your charity may cover a multitude of sins by leading wicked men to "the fountain for all sin and uncleanness." The psalmist says, "Blessed is the man whose sin is covered." How does God cover a man's sins? By his infinite mercy in Christ. When you lead a sinner to the feet of Jesus, and he there makes confession of his guilt, and begs for mercy his sins are instantly covered. Better than that, they are blotted out. "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day,
And there may we, though vile as he,
Wash all our sins away.

Beneath that crimson tide, charity the charity that goes out to seek and to save the lost—may hide a multitude of sin! In the heart and on the lips of the humblest man among us, it can guide souls, vary and heavy laden with guilt, to him who giveth eternal rest. If among the redeemed millions, grouped yonder on the everlasting hills, there is even one white-robed spirit who will greet me before the White Throne of Judgment, and say to the Judge, "Through his charity mine sins were covered," it will be the realization of my highest and fondest aspiration.

An Active Life Ended.
Death of Rev. Talbot Wilson Chambers, one of the Bible Revisers.

In the recent death of Rev. Talbot W. Chambers, S. T. D., LL. D., there has passed away one of the most noted theologians of a generation, a man great in scholarship, broad in activities and strong and faithful in his devotion to the cause of the Christian religion. Dr. Chambers was born in Pennsylvania in 1819, and after study at Rutgers College, New Brunswick, and Princeton, became pastor of the Second Reformed Church at Somerville, N. J., and later associate pastor of the Collegiate Reformed Church of New York City. He represented that church and his denomination in many benevolent organizations local and national. He was President of the General Synod in 1863, and repeatedly filled ad interim chairs of Biblical Literature or Dogmatic Theology in New Brunswick Seminary and also at Princeton, Union, Hartford, Allegheny and Lane. For many years he was Chairman of the Committee on Versions of the American Bible Society, and member of the Publishing Committee of the American Tract Society, and was a member of the American Bible Revision Committee, Old Testament Company. With the late Dr. Saff and Principal McCosh he was active in the organization of the Alliance of Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian System. For several years he was Chairman of the Western Section of the Executive Commission and in 1892 was chosen to succeed Prof. W. G. Blaikie as President of the Commission. In all that related to the advancement of his own denomination and to the cause of religion at large he was profoundly interested, and spared neither time, means, nor effort to make his services effective. For several years he was President of the Board of Foreign Missions. As writer and preacher, as well as in numberless executive capacities, his zeal and energy were displayed. He was a copious contributor to the publications of his own denomination, and was for a time associate editor of the Presbyterian reformed Review. In 1853, Columbia College conferred upon him the degree of S. T. D., and Rutgers in 1885 bestowed upon him the degree of LL. D. Dr. Chambers for some years before his death was a widower. He leaves three daughters and several sons. In matters of doctrine, Dr. Chambers was strictly conservative, and defended his theological opinions with a vigor and tenacity that usually won its way in controversy. A careful and thorough student and one of the most learned men in the American pulpit, he was a pillar of strength in support of the orthodox interpretation of Scripture and a stalwart and uncompromising champion of what he believed to be the truth. His ability as a scholar, writer and thinker, his sterling character and his earnestness and vigor in all he undertook have been widely recognized and his death is a loss that will be keenly felt by the church to which, in his long lifetime, he was so warmly attached.

A Plea for the Birds.

The committee of the Society for the Protection of Birds have, through their chairman, addressed a personal appeal to the clergy and ministers of all denominations, asking them to use their influence with the ladies of their congregations to discourage the revived practice of wearing birds and feathers as head-dress ornaments. "Many ladies," writes Mr. Hudson, "have become avowedly indifferent as to the manner in which the decorations they affect are obtained; and, callous themselves, do not hesitate to outrage public opinion. It is a distressing experience to sit at service Sunday after Sunday in the midst of a forest of waving feathers, with which so many heads in every congregation are decked. Those who are acquainted with the facts and persist in following such a mode, cannot be accounted guiltless of the cruelties practiced on living birds."

"She Never Heard of Jesus."

At the Little Italy Christian Union, 2224 First Ave., New York, a little girl twelve years of age came to Sunday School for the first time last week and in reply to a question by the missionary, said: "No, I don't know anything about God; never heard of him."
"Have you never heard of Jesus, then?"
"No, ma'am, who is he?"

A NEW SERIAL STORY,

WRITTEN EXPRESSLY
BY THE
For the CHRISTIAN HERALD,
REV. EDWARD AUGUSTUS RAND

CHAPTER VIII.

The time is not yet come.

IT was the next day after the announcement of Madame Morton's death that Lawyer Skeele was sitting alone in his office. He was sitting gloomily before a small fire that sulkily spattered on the hearth. The fire-place was an old one, and showed its age. Everything was worn and old; the floors, the desks, the books on the shelves and the lawyer himself looked decrepit. A dismal rain was striking at the windows, as if clamoring to get in and ravage and destroy all that was left.

On the table before him was Madame's will. Projecting from its side still, was the slip of paper the lawyer had attached to it when he drew the will. If that slip bearing the word, "Morton," remained on the will, the property would go to "the daughter of Judson Skeele Morton"—our friend Janet. But one snip of the long shears lying on the lawyer's table, and the property would go to the daughter of Judson Skeele. Ever since the lawyer drew the will he had been debating with himself whether he should give that snip.

On his return from the Morton mansion with the will in his pocket he sat fascinated by the thought of the ease with which the property might be diverted from Janet to Lavina. It was only a thought, but it charmed Skeele's fancy. The next day his mind reverted to it. He did no wrong, it was only a thought.

But thoughts grow if cherished. Something comes from them. They have an increase as much as a shoot out of the earth. They move on as precisely as a law working toward its end. The thought that is wrong we had better look out for, and show it the door at once. Just a thought, the idle wind going by, may grow into a tornado. The slave may become our arbitrary, brutal master. Lawyer Skeele housed and fed his thought.

As he meditated, he began to consider Lavina's inheritance of the Morton home just as a possibility? No; a probability? Neither, but a degree of contingency that was a pendulum between the two words, possibility and probability, swinging first one way and then the other. He took up the shears and put between their long, spotted jaws that addition to the margin of the will, and made the slightest cut in the world! Perhaps the one-hundredth part of an inch! Just to see how it would look—but he let the shears speedily drop! It was a dangerous tempting.

If any one had seen Skeele drop the shears they might have thought he had cut his hand, he dropped them so suddenly. Did he cut his hand?

No, but he had cut into his soul, into that part of man's nature where wounds are very serious. A shadow fell upon the floor. Was it from the form of an officer rushing in to seize on Skeele for fraudulent handling of a will? He was so relieved to know it was only a window-blind suddenly swinging on its hinges and sending a shadow into the room. Alarmed, he packed up the will with the other papers, and placing them in the safe, locked the door. Then he went home. On his way thither, the pendulum swung toward possibility. That word, "Morton," had perhaps better be snipped off. Then there came the preparation for "Lavina's" and after supper, "have you been at Madame Morton's lately?"

"Why, no? Why should I go there?" She said this impatiently. She pettishly brushed herself, and then went to Madame Morton's. "What interest have I in Madame Morton? I'm sure she has none in me. She's going to die, too. Calls me a fortune hunter, and so on."

"What if you were mentioned in her will?"

"Me, Pa?"

"Yes, suppose that you had been. It would look better if you had shown the old lady some attention."

"Oh, well! That would make a difference."

Nothing more was said, but Lavina covetously took the hint, and as we heard, Pauline report, there had not been a day when "that Skeele girl" had not been up to inquire after her "dear old friend."

Still, the lawyer considered that he had not decided. So long as that projecting slip of paper remained on the will, it was open to him to be honest. When the news of the old lady's death reached him, he took the will out of his safe and looked at it again. The thought had been so long in his mind that it had come to the harvest. It was ripe to be translated into action.

"Anyone looking?" he thought, as he took up the shears. On the shelf above the table was a stuffed owl that had been shot on the Morton grounds, and given to him by Madame.

"What a disagreeable face that owl has!" he now thought. Was this goggle-eyed bird deputed by Madame to stand there as sentinel and guard the interests of the Morton heirs?

"You ugly bird! What are you looking at?" he exclaimed. Seizing the shears and rising from his seat, he struck the big-eyed watchman a heavy, unceremonious blow that sent it into a dark corner, its unseemly eyes turned toward the wall.

"There!" he said with satisfaction, resumed his seat, and taking up the will, applied the shears to the obnoxious margin. He hesitated. He looked about once more. Anybody watching? No; he began to cut. What was that noise in an outer room, where he kept his clerk at work, and where callers waited till admitted to the inner office? He turned his guilty eyes toward the door leading into this outer room. He listened. No sound save the beating of the rain and the ticking clock above the fire-place. The clock went slowly, deliberately, as if saying, "Cut—cut! Cut—cut! Cut—cut!" He heard three of its pendulum swings, "cut-cut," and taking its advice, cut off that little projecting slip which alone stood between Lavina and the property.

As it fluttered to the ground, and while he still held the will in one hand and the shears in the other, the door suddenly opened and his clerk, Tobias, put in his head. The lawyer sprang to his feet and excitedly faced the intruder, still clutching both will and shears. He had such a wild, startled look, and he gave the old shears such an excited flourish, that Tobias started back as if he thought his time had come, and his head might be lopped off. It was hard to say which was the more frightened man of the two.

"Wh—wh—what you want, Tobias?"

"N—n—nothing. You—you want me, sir?"

"Wh—wh—why, no! You out there!"

"I thought if you didn't want me, I'd go home."

"No; don't go yet. Stay here. I want to go out. You go to your desk."

It was a very oppressive place to him now, that inner office. Its walls were constricting, pressing closer, closer. Its atmosphere was suffocating. He must get away. He placed the will back in his safe and locked it up. Seizing his hat he hurried out of the office. The air was refreshing. He opened his umbrella and walked off. People saw him under the umbrella with face averted more than ever. His clerk stayed in the office as his employer directed. He went to his desk as also directed, but the moment Judson Skeele's feet ceased to make an echo on the stairway, Tobias hurried into the inner room.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, THE CHRISTIAN HOME, AND THE CHRISTIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL are published weekly by the Christian Herald Association, 100 N. 3rd St., Philadelphia, Pa.

"Well, if the squire didn't look nervous! That was queer! 'he soliloquized, looking round carefully. 'What was he doing? What was he cutting with those shears? Looked like—well, a deed, or—or a will! I saw the seal on it, and—and—what's this?'"

He picked up a little slip of paper under the table. He read on it the one word, "Morton." "Funny!" he ejaculated. "Morton? Couldn't have anything to do with that old woman who has just died—that old woman where the hall was so dark, who wanted her will made out, could it? Morton! Morton! Its edge looks cut. I will stick this in my pocket-book. Could he have cut it off with those shears he had? Well, I don't know why he should take the old lady's name off. However, I don't know as its any business of mine. And what's that down in the old coping? Ha-ha! If the old owl isn't down here! Say, have you and your master had a duel, and did he knock you down here? I'll set you back in your place, old bird."

Tobias waited at his desk patiently until the usual hour for the closing of the office. Then he went out into the rain which was more dismal than ever, and was glad when he reached his home.

It was a poor home, not near so pretentious as Lawyer Skeele's, but there was peace in it and a conscience void of offence. In the employer's home there was not only the consciousness of guilt, but the haunting fear of detection which was a much more disquieting thing. Skeele had a horror of being found out.

Duly the contents of Madame Morton's will were made known, and there was great surprise on every hand. "Lavina Skeele goin' to live here!" said Paulina in the midst of her cheerful rag-mats. "Don't understand that!"

Nobody else understood the reason why. However, there was the will in black and white. Nobody could contradict it, save the one person who made and mutilated it. But in Tobias Newhall's pocket-book was a bit of paper, bearing the word "Morton" in Judson Skeele's writing. "I don't know how you can ever be worth anything," said Tobias as he took it out and looked at it, "but I'll keep you safe, on the chance of your being an interesting exhibit some day." He took a daily paper

CHAPTER IX.

My Captain at Rest.

During the progress of her cousin's fever, which soon showed typhoid characteristics and caused Dr. Bent to shake his head ominously, Janet often thought of what she had said about putting himself in God's hands. And she could not ask herself why she had never before specially thought of the subject in a personal light. It was not difficult for another person to see the reason. Her father's example had been a hindrance. He was never a religious man. He had always shown a sort of self-sufficiency and had taken great comfort in the contrast of his own good works, with the poor works of other people especially those professing to be Christians. Janet had felt his influence. Then there was the old Morton pride to distress her in her indifference. She did not relish the conviction of deficiencies, at much less did she like any confession of them. So she had gone on, her father's example before her and Janet Morton's pride within her, and the years saw no change in her attitude toward the subject of religion. But her mother's death had involved Janet's ideas in a terrible whirl. Mrs. Judson Morton was a person of a positive character than her husband, but very lovable and a Christian woman. Janet has always felt that she was more influenced by her father to be indifferent toward a religious life than by her mother to be interested in it. But after her mother's death, she felt that she had made a mistake in estimating the comparative strength of her father's and her mother's influence. When her mother died, something went out of Janet's life that was like the passing of daylight out of the sky. What had been a quiet, uneventful life in the homestead, the days going on like a current of peace amid green-flowered banks, was suddenly thrown into a wild, confusing whirl round and round. Nothing seemed to be stable. The uncertainty of life—her own, that of her friends, sickened Janet. She was going round and round in this whirlpool, and when would it end come and peace?

When there was Madame Morton's sudden going. It did not make so close a contact with her, and yet it added an element of unrest to Janet's agitation. Then came her cousin's sickness under her roof. What a succession of sicknesses, of stormy days, of wild nights, the shadows blackening steadily into Death's valley! Of all the above cases, her cousin's had most affected Janet in its suggestions of a wronged place amid this agitation. She had seen him put his past into God's hands, his mistakes, failures, sins. And when Janet contrasted her past with John's, though the former seemed so even and steady, so well regulated and John's so reckless and extravagant, yet she said to herself, "There was given to John a nature different from mine, a nature impressionable and yielding. He was also thrown into a life full of solicitation. Mine was protected by the influence of a home, sequestered and secluded." She could not find the great satisfaction in the comparison which she made with his past, when allowance was made for temperament and surroundings. The comparison crumbled down her soborn pride. But all his deficiencies, she had seen John Morton take to God and leave to His forgiving mercy. To the she compassionate hands, she had seen John bring his child, that drift-away who was somewhere, and leave his little Carrie to God's hands. What about his future? Could he commit that to God?

John's death was very peaceful. His sickness was marked ultimately by the familiar typhoid stages. Part of the time, he was delirious as if some evil creature had grappled and were trying to throw him. He came out of these struggles very weak. So that as a rule thought and action were an effort and apt to be confused. But there were spaces of clear intellect, little seasons when the sun shone again, and when it was easy to talk with him. Then he asked for "that little girl who sang," and Janet brought Ethel who sang to him and touched him too with her dainty fingers and pitied him.

"That does me good," he told Janet.

Toward death, it seemed as if the spaces of clear sky multiplied and there was a bright shining of the sun.

"I have put all into His hands, all my future," he told Janet, looking up as he spoke, "and what is put there, is safe."

"I shall find what I have given to God some time," were his last words, and with a smile as if of the joy both of expectation and discovery, he passed out of sight.

Those were very quiet days after John's death. At first, there was the stir of a family movement, for Janet carried out a cherished plan to ask Mr. and Mrs. Blakey Chase beneath her roof. They were in need of a tenement, their house having been sold, and they came readily into the Morton home, Janet taking her place with them as a boarder. Restful days followed, whole days of active thought, for Janet constantly recalled John's sickness and going.

"All into his hands!" Could she leave everything just there, her past impotence, her present submission, her future in confidence and hope? Her future, what would she do with it? It was a very perplexing question. She must have some kind of a life-work. She had been informed by Lawyer Skeele that a portion of Madame Morton's estate would come to her when the estate could be settled, but it would not be a large sum. He did not tell her how small he had made her fraction of this inheritance. Something Janet must do toward a living. The house her parents had bequeathed her, carried on the title-deed an ugly mortgage-patch, and this property would be the source of little income. What would she do in the future? She could teach school, having had a little experience in the management of boys and girls. John had told her that she could nurse soldiers at the war. Would she do either? What was to be her life-work? The uncertain future could she leave with God? Could she make her life a part of that great, divine life which would take possession of her, fill and occupy her, and which would work in her "both to will and to do at his good pleasure."

Discontented Women.

BY MRS. AMELIA E. BARR.

From "North American Review" for February.
By special permission.

DISCONTENT is a vice six thousand years old, and it will be eternal; because it is in the race. We may premise, in order to clear the way, that there is a nobil discontent which has a great work to do in the world; a discontent which is the antidote to conceit and self-satisfaction, and which urges the worker of every kind continually to realize a higher ideal. Springing from regret and desire, between these two sighs, all horizons lift; and the pervasion of its longing gives to those who feel this divine discontent the power to leap whatever separates them from their hope and their aspiration.

One of the saddest domestic features of the age is the dispute into which housekeeping has fallen; for that is a woman's natural duty and answers to the needs of her best nature. It is by no means necessary that she should be a Cinderella among the ashes, or a Nausicaa washing her face in a Penelope forever at her needle, or a woman of intelligence now understanding that good cooking is a liberal science, and that there is a most intimate connection between food and virtue, and food and health, and food and thought. It must be noted that this revolt of certain women against housekeeping is not a revolt against their husbands; it is simply a revolt against their duties. They consider housekeeping a hard and monotonous and inferior, and needless with a cynical frankness that they prefer to engross paper, or dabble in art or embroidery pillow-shams, or sell soap or in some way make money to pay debts who will cook their husband's food and nurse their babies for them. They believe that in this way they have themselves to have superior minds, and to credit for a deed which ought to be done with shame. For actions speak louder than words, and what does such a woman say? In the first place, it asserts that a stranger—even a young uneducated peasant girl hired for a few dollars a month—is able to perform the duties of the house-mistress and the mother. In the second place, it substitutes a poor ambition for love, and hand service for heart service. In the third place, it is a visible abasement of the loftiest duties of womanhood to the duty of the lowest paid service. A wife and mother cannot thus absolve her own soul; she simply disgraces and traduces her best work.

Suppose even that housekeeping is hard and monotonous, it is not more so than any work in the city. The first lesson a woman has to learn is to do pleasantly what he does not like to do. All useful work must be monotonous, and one ought to make it easy; and at any rate, the tedium of housework is not any greater than the tedium of office work. If housekeeping being degrading, that is the vilest nonsense. Home is a little bit of heaven; and if the housewife and mother are elements finely mixed, and loftily educated, all the more she will regard the question of importance, and the quality of the soup, and the quality of chutney in the curry, as requiring her best attention. It is only the poorest, silliest women who cannot lift their work to the level of their thoughts, and ennoble both.

There are other types of the discontented wife, with whom we are all too familiar. For instance, the wife who is stunned and miserable because she discovers that marriage is not a lasting picnic; who cannot realize that the husband must be different from the lover; and spends her days in potent whining. There are also wives who load their husbands into extravagant expenditure, and urge them to protect from which they would naturally escape. There are others, whose social ambitions slay their domestic ones, and who strain every nerve, in season and out of season, and lose all their self-respect, for a few crumbs of contemptuous patronage from some person of greater wealth than their own. Some lead themselves into wretched lives because they cannot get three times as many servants as necessary; a still greater number because they cannot compass a life of constant amusement and excitement.

Every disagreeable kind of discontented woman is the wife who instead of having God to love and worship, makes a proof of her religion, alienates love for an ecclesiastical idea, or neglects her own flesh and blood, to carry the religious needs of the world; forgetting that the good wife keeps her sentiments very close to her own heart and hearth. But perhaps the majority of discontented wives have no special thing to complain of, they fret because they are "so dull." If they took the trouble to look for the cause of this "dullness," they would find it in the want of some definite plan of life, and some vigorous aim or object. Of course any aim implies limitation, but limitation implies both virtue and pleasure. Without rule and law, not even the games of children could exist, and the stricter the rules of a game are obeyed, the greater the satisfaction. A wife's duty is subject to the same conditions. If aimless, plaintive women would make strict laws for their households, and lay out some possible vigorous plan for their own lives, they would find that those who love and work, have no leisure for complaining. But from whatever cause domestic discontent springs, it makes the home full of idleness, ennui, and vagrant imaginations; or of fierce extravagance, and passionate love of amusement. And as a wife holds the happiness of many in her hands, discontent with her destiny is peculiarly wicked.

Married women, however, are by no means the only complainers. There is a great army of discontents who, having no men to care for them, are clamoring, and with justice, for their share of the world's work and wages. Such women have a perfect right to make a way for themselves, in whatever direction they best can. Now, earnest practical women-workers are blessed, and a blessing; but the discontented among them, by much talking and little doing, continually put back the cause they say they wish to advance. No women are in the main so discontented as women-workers. The discontent of working women is understandable, but it is a wide jump from the woman discontented about her work or wages to the woman discontented about her political position. Who does not love far more than mere cleverness, that sweetness of temper, that sunny contented disposition, which goes through the world with a smile and a kind word for every one? It is one of the richest gifts of heaven; it is, according to Bishop Wilson, "nine-tenths of Christianity." Fortunately, the vast majority of women have been loyal to their sex and their vocation. In every community the makers and keepers of homes are the dominant power. Some of the modern discontent of women must be laid to unconscious influence. In every age there is a kind of atmosphere which we call "the spirit of the times," and which, while it lasts, deceives as to the importance and truth of its dominant opinions. Many women have thus doubtless caught the fever of discontent by mere contact, but such have only to reflect a little, and discover that... the great secret of content abides in the unconscious acceptance of life and the fulfillment of its duties—a happiness serious and universal, but full of comfort and help.

An Asthma Cure at Last.

Medical Science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma in the remarkable Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that it cured him of Asthma of fifty years standing, and Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair, being unable to lie down night or day from Asthma. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To make the matter sure, these and hundreds of other cures are sworn to under oath before a notary public. So great is their faith in its wonderful curative powers, the Kola Importing Co., 1764 Broadway, New York, is sending out large trial cases of the Kola compound free to all sufferers from Asthma. Send them your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large trial case by mail free. It costs you nothing and you should surely try it.

Heard the Heavenly Song.
Triumphant Death of an American Missionary in China.

MISS DAVIES, a young missionary of the China Inland Mission, and who was trained at the Moody Institute in Chicago, on proceeding to her field of labor, was stationed at Chinkiang. She was the promised bride of one of the missionaries. A few weeks ago she grew sick and it was soon apparent that the young worker was about to leave her field of labor forever. Regarding her dying moments a sister missionary writes this beautiful account:

"Before sinking into unconsciousness, she asked one of the sisters to read the thirtieth of John to her. She expressed great satisfaction. During the last days she had a few conscious minutes now and then, in the midst of the delirium. One afternoon she asked us to sing 'When we shall see Jesus, for the shadows lengthen, Across this little landscape of our life; We would see Jesus, our weak faith to strengthen For the last weariness—the final strife.'"

"With trembling voices we sang the whole hymn, knowing that those closed eyes would soon indeed see him whom her soul loved. At another time she asked the sister to begin Dr. Gordon's hymn, 'My Jesus, I love thee,' and literally with the dew on her brow, our dying sister sang:

"When the death dew lies cold on my brow,
If ever I loved thee, my Jesus, 'tis now."

"With perfect calmness she gave parting messages to friends in China and America. Mentioning one friend's name she said, 'I'll give her 'When he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them'; I didn't want me to go to China.' To another she said, 'I'll give her 'The Lord is a sun and shield; he will give thee aid and glory.' For Rev. F. A. Steven, Toronto, she said, 'Tell him 'My sheep hear my voice, and I know them and they follow me.' To others she gave the tit, 'I have loved thee with an everlasting love.' On the morning of her death she asked for me. When I came to her bedside she said, 'I think I am getting nearer home, now, am I not?' 'Yes,' I said, 'you are getting very near; but the Lord Jesus is very near to you just now.' I stood quietly watching her for a few moments, when she turned slightly round and said, eagerly, 'Did you hear it? They are singing!' After lying quiet for a few more seconds, she asked us if we didn't hear them, as they were again singing. 'It was almost the last thing that she said before peacefully passing away to be forever with the Lord. What an honor is his to die for Jesus!'"

A French Protest.
protest against the iniquitous war France is waging on Madagascar has appeared from an unexpected source. The Bookbinders' Trade Union of Lyons, have addressed a noble reply to an appeal to them for contributions in aid of the Madagascar expedition. They courteously refuse to give any encouragement to it, and earnestly protest against it as a wicked and indefensible act. They remark that, "While, in our view, war is always a horrible curse, this war is not only a curse, but a disgrace, an iniquity, a crime against humanity, and, in short, a sacrilege. Its real object is to impose, in the interests of commerce, upon a young nation, whose only fault is that of being weak, a foreign yoke which we ourselves would not for a moment tolerate. The duty laid upon us by justice is simple, and expressed in this axiom of the eternal law: 'Do not to others what you would not wish that they should do to you. No people have a right to take away by violence or by fraud the liberties of another nation.'" That was an answer worthy of all praise.

Dr. Talmage's New Book — "THE EARTH GIRDLED"

Is Ready. He Thinks It Contains the Best Thought and Most Earnest Work of His Life, and Says so in a Letter to His Publisher, Reproduced on this Page.

EVIDENTLY a great many other people think the same way, for the first edition of 100,000 copies was sold before it left the presses. MORE THAN A MILLION COPIES will be distributed in the United States alone within the next few months, and the demand is so universal that the book is to be issued immediately in Europe, Australia, and British India, where Dr. Talmage is as well known and as

During this tremendous journey he studied savagery, fetichism, Bramanism, Jadooism, Mohammedanism, fatalism and all the "occult and incult" isms of the world, barbarous and half-civilized races that he traveled among. He saw more than any other explorer who has "GIRDLED THE EARTH," and he describes it as no explorer has ever before described THE WONDERS OF THE WORLD.

The Book is a Marvel and a Wonder within Itself

Before starting on his now famous trip the Doctor supplied himself fully with the latest and best photographing apparatus, and was accompanied by his son and private

Washington D. C.

January 22nd 1896

Dear Mr. Smith

You may say to my friends that "The Earth Girdled" is the most vigorous work of my life I wrote after seeing things with my own eyes, & hope that others in reading may have as much joy as I have had in writing.

I love this new child of my brain & I want it to be a blessing to all who may greet it.

Yours &c

popular, through the medium of his published sermons and writings, as he is in America. It is estimated that FIFTEEN MILLIONS of people read his sermons every week. This is a good indication of the tremendous circulation awaiting his new book, which he himself considers the crowning effort of his life, the crystallization of all previous efforts.

It appears, therefore, that the wide-awake "book-agent," as well as thousands of other intelligent people who have been waiting during the late "hard times" for something "to trun up," will have a veritable gold mine in the sale of this great work. We have heard of reports of sales running as high as 20 to 30 copies a day by single salesmen. The simple mention by the agent of Dr. Talmage's new book OPENS EVERY DOOR WIDE WITH WELCOME.

The book is splendidly written in Dr. Talmage's happiest combination of humor, pathos, flowery description, and withering sarcasm, when the lion in his nature is aroused by injustice or wrong to the weak and innocent. He started on his "EARTH GIRDLING" journey with the avowed determination of studying all the religions of the world, and if he could find a better one than Christianity, embracing it. His line of travel led him among some of the wildest and strangest people who now inhabit the earth, many of whom were but recently cannibals, and it is said that some of them, even now, cast wistful glances toward the old and better looking subjects. The Doctor conversed with several missionaries who had themselves been condemned to be eaten, and graphically describes their peculiar sensations during the period of sore trial.

After crossing our own continent, he visited the Sandwich Islands, Hawaii, Samoa, New Zealand, the Islands of the Pacific, Australia, and traveled through wonderful India by rail, boat, palanquin and on the backs of camels and elephants. Thence he explored Egypt, the land of Moses and the Pharaohs, and ascended the Nile almost to the borders of Ethiopia. From Egypt he passed over into Arabia, Syria and Palestine, returning home by way of Greece, Italy, Europe, the British Isles and Russia.

secretary, by whose assistance he was enabled to photograph and describe the curious people and the strange and wonderful sights and scenes that they encountered. He secured representative characters of different races, scenery, landscapes, curious implements, wonderful ruins, historical places, heathen temples, pagodas, mosques, palaces, courts cathedrals, castles, caves of superstition, combes, homes of the people in different countries, and all the other strange and curious things that go to make up the world.

More than Four Hundred of These Remarkable Photographs have been reproduced in the book, in addition to Eight Full Page and Very Beautiful Colored Plates made by the new photographic color process, which only reproduces the scenes with perfect life-like accuracy but also in their natural colors. These photographs constitute one of the most wonderful and instructive picture galleries ever seen in a book.

Take it all in all. "THE EARTH GIRDLED" is one of the great books of the century, and certainly the greatest book of travel, exploration, and discovery ever published. It marks an era in this line of literature, and proves Dr. Talmage to be as great a "Path Finder" as explorer as he is preacher, orator, and author.

"THE EARTH GIRDLED" has come to stay. It is a book of the ages and for all time. It is sold exclusively by subscription, and we advise all who are in need of paying employment to apply at once for agency. The publishers have abundant capital, and handle work on the most liberal basis, so that any person of good character can secure territory and conduct a large and profitable business absolutely without capital. Illustrations circulards and full particulars will be mailed free to all who apply in time. If you desire an agency, send your address to the

AMERICA FOR GOD.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Rev. 13: 11, "And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns like a lamb and he spake as a dragon."

IN America mentioned in the Bible? Learned and consecrated men who have studied the inspired books of Daniel and Revelation more than I have and understand them better agree in saying that the leopard mentioned in the Bible meant Grecia, and the bear meant Medo-Persia, and the lion meant Babylon, and the beast of the text coming up out of the earth with two horns like a lamb, and the voice of a dragon means our country, because among other reasons it seemed to come up out of the earth when Columbus discovered it, and it has been for the most part at peace like a lamb, unless assailed by foreign foe, in which case it has had two horns strong and sharp, and the voice of a dragon loud enough to make all nations hear the roar of its indignation. Is it reasonable to suppose that God would leave out from the prophecies of his Book this whole Western Hemisphere? No, no. "I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon."

Germany for scholarship, England for manufactories, France for manners, Egypt for antiquities, Italy for pictures. But America for God!

I start with the cheering thought that the most popular book on earth to-day is the Bible, the most popular institution on earth to-day is the church, and the most popular name on earth to-day is Jesus. Right from this audience hundreds of men and women would, if need be, march out and die for him.

Am I too confident in saying "America for God?" If the Lord will help me I will show the strength and extent of the long line of fortresses to be taken, and give you my reasons for saying it can be done and will be done. Let us decide, in this battle for God, whether we are at Bull Run or at Gettysburg. There is a Fourth of Julyish way of bragging about this country, and the most tired and plucked bird that ever flew through the heavens is the American Eagle, when the Mr. Gladstone and to me facetiously, at Hawarden: "I hear that the fish in your American lakes are so large that when one of them is taken out the entire lake is perceptibly lowered," and at a dinner given in Paris an American offered for a sentiment: "Here is to the United States,—bounded on the north by the aurora borealis, on the south by the equator, on the east by primeval chaos, and on the west by the Day of Judgment." The effect of such bombast is to inflame the passions and to enfeeble the intellect. The worst thing to do in any emergency is to utter such words. I will have so much to say about the future of this country.

This land to be taken for God, according to Huxley, the statistician, is three thousand nine hundred and sixty-seven square miles, a width and a length that none but the Omnipotent can appreciate. Four Europes put together, and capable of holding and feeding as it will hold and feed, according to Atkinson, the statistician, if the world continues in existence and does not run afoul of some other world or get consumed by the fires already burning in the cellars of the planet,—capable, I say, of holding and feeding more than one billion of inhabitants. For you must remember it must be held for God as well as taken for God, and the last five hundred million inhabitants must not be allowed to swamp the religion of the first five hundred million. Not much use in taking the fortress if we cannot hold it. It must be held until the Archangel's trumpet bids living and dead arise from this foundering planet.

You must remember it is only about seven o'clock in the morning of our nation's life. Great cities are to flash and roar among what are called the "Bad Lands" of the Dakotas and the great "Columbia Plains" of Washington State, and that on which we put our schoolboy fingers on the map and spelled out as the "Great American Desert," is, through systematic and consummating irrigation, to bloom like Chatsworth Park and be made more productive than those regions dependent upon uncertain and spasmodic rainfall. All those regions, as well as these regions already cultivated, to be inhabited! That was a sublime thing said by Henry Clay, while crossing the Allegheny Mountains, and he was waiting for the stage horses to be rested, as he stood on a rock, arms folded, looking off into the valley, and some one said to him, "Mr. Clay, what are you thinking about?" He replied, "I am listening to the on-coming tramp of the future generations of America." Have you laid our home missionary scheme on such an infinitude of scale? If the work of bringing one soul to God is so great, can a thousand million be captured? In this country, already planted and to be overcome, Paganism has built its altar to Brahma, and the Chinese are already burning incense in their temples, and Mohammedanism, drunk in other days with the red wine of human blood at Lucknow and Cawnpore, and now fresh from the diabolism in Armenia, is trying to get a foothold here, and from the minarets of her mosques will yet mumble her blasphemies, saying, "God is great, and Mohammed is his prophet." Then there are the vaster multitudes with no religion at all. They worship no God, they live with no consolation, and they die with no hope. No star of peace points down to the manger in which they are born, and no prayer is uttered over the grave into which they sink. Then there is Alcoholism, its piled up demijohns and beer barrels, and hogsheads of fiery death, a barricade high and long as the Alleghenies, and Rockies and Sierra Nevadas, pouring forth day and night their ammunition of wretchedness and woe. When a German wants to take a drink, he takes beer. When an Englishman wants to take a drink, he takes ale. When a Scotchman wants to take a drink, he takes whisky. But when an American wants to take a drink, he takes anything he can lay his hands on.

Plenty of statistics to tell how much money is spent in this country for rum, and how many drunkards die! But who will give us the statistics of how many hearts are crushed under the heel of this worst demon of the centuries? How many hopes blasted? How many children turned out on the world, accursed with stigma of a debauched ancestry? Until the worm of the distillery becomes the worm that never dies, and the smoke of the heated wine vats becomes the smoke of the torment that ascendeth up forever and ever! Alcoholism, swearing—not with hand uplifted toward heaven, for from that direction it can get no help; but with right hand stretched down toward the perdition from which it came up—swearing that it will not cease as long as there are any homesteads to despoil, any magnificent men and women to destroy, any immortal souls to damn, any more nations to balk, any more civilizations to extinguish.

Then there is what in America we call Socialism, in France Communism, and in Russia Nihilism—the three names for one and the same thing—and having but two doctrines in its creed: First, there is no God. Second, there shall be no rights of property. One of their chief journals printed this sentiment: "Dynamite can be made out of the dead bodies of capitalists as well as out of hogs." One of the leaders of Communism left inscribed on his prison wall, where he had been justly incarcerated, these words: "When once you are dead, there is an end of everything; therefore, ye scoundrels, grab whatever you can—only don't let yourselves be grabbed. Amen!" There are in this country hundreds of thousands of these lazy scoundrels. Honest men deplore it when they cannot get work, but those of whom I speak will not do work when they can get it. I tried to employ one who asked me for money. I said, "Down in my cellar I have some wood to saw, and I will pay you for it." For a little while I heard the saw going, and then I heard it no more. I went downstairs, and found the wood, but the workman had disappeared, taking for company both buck and saw.

Socialism, Communism, and Nihilism mean, "Too wicked to acknowledge God, and too lazy to earn a living," and among the mightiest obstacles to be overcome are those organized elements of domestic, social, and political ruin.
